17 years of Tory taxing, borrowing, selling-off and spending cost Britain £3,204bn

We can't go on like this

DIANE COYLE
Economics Editor

The Government is literally bankrupt - with net wealth declining from nearly £20bn in 1979 to minus £152bn at the end of last year, according to official figures.

High levels of borrowing for most of the past 17 years mean the Government's debts have grown far faster than its assets.

An assessment of the state of government finances going back to 1979, in the newly released official publication Public Finance Trends, makes clear that trends in spending and taxation are unsustainable. Whichever party wins the general election is likely to have to either raise taxes or cut spending - just as the Conservatives did after the 1992 election.

The figures also reveal that the scale of government spending as a share of national income is almost exactly the same as it was when Margaret Thatcher first came to power in 1979 because increases in social spending have matched real decreases in other areas of expenditure. Despite their rhetoric, there has been no rolling back of the state under the Conservatives.

Since 1979, the Government has spent a total of more than £3,200bn, financed by the windfalls of privatisation revenues, North Sea taxes, other taxation and high levels of borrowing. Interest payments on government debt, which has nearly quadrupled since 1979, now make up the fourth biggest category of expenditure after social security, education and health.

The national debt has doubled during John Major's premiership alone, and now stands at £385.5bn.

The two nearly exhausted windfalls of North Sea tax revenues and privatisation have provided the Conservatives with more than £77bn and £64bn respectively. Receipts from other taxes have amounted to more than £2,800bn, but have grown more slowly than the economy because of tax cuts prior to 1993.

The gap has been plugged by borrowings of nearly £223bn during the 17 years since 1979. Social security accounts for the lion's share of public expenditure - £77.2bn out of the grand total of £303.9bn last financial year, and £77bn out of the 17-year total of £3,204bn. Although unemployment benefits, along with supplementary benefit and income support, have grown dramatically, other entitlements such as retirement and widows' pensions and invalidity benefit swallow the bulk of the social security budget.

Despite the inducement to opt out of the earnings-related state pension scheme in favour of a personal pension, taken up by millions of people, the state pension bill has increased from £8.6bn in 1979 to £40.9bn last year. The bill for unemployment-related benefits has climbed from just under £3bn to £17.7bn.

In a tacit acknowledgement of the severity of their "fiscal incontinence", Conservatives such as Chris Patten, the Governor of Hong Kong, and William Waldegrave, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, have talked about the need to scale back the welfare state. One senior Tory said:

"There has been a broad change in philosophy among centrist politicians about the need to get the size of government back to early Sixties levels."

The shadow Chancellor, Gordon Brown, reacting to the figures, said yesterday: "The Tories cannot claim to be the party of economic prudence. These figures prove that they cannot manage the economy... They tell lies about Labour and tax because they do not want anyone to know the truth about their own policies."

Bill Martin, chief economist at the City investment bank UBS and an adviser to the House of Commons Treasury Select Committee, said: "The Conservatives have cut taxes too much and they have let the social security budget get out of control. Even without pre-election tax cuts, there is an intractable problem."

Yet the figures also make uncomfortable reading for Labour politicians. In a recent study of the economic outlook for a Labour government, Mr Martin predicted that the Conservatives' failure to control the underlying growth in public spending, and their over-generous tax cuts, could leave Labour with an inheritance of budget deficits in excess of 5 per cent of national income by the end of the century.

To cut this gap to a more sustainable 2.5 per cent would require a rise of 7p in the basic rate of income tax.

David Walton at Goldman Sachs, a City expert who is drawing up the highly respected annual "green budget" with the Institute for Fiscal Studies, was equally gloomy.

"Demand for front-line public services grows at least as fast as the economy," he said. "You have to question whether recent cuts in public spending, achieved by cutting investment and civil service running costs, can be sustained."

Paradoxically, the public sector borrowing requirement could turn out to be better than many economists expect in the run-up to the election. The monthly figures are highly sensitive to the state of the economy, so the consumer recovery engineered by the Chancellor, Kenneth Clarke, will help a cyclical fall in the public-sector borrowing requirement to disguise the long-term problem.

Police pledge broken

The number of police officers has dropped in the past year, despite Government pledges to get more bobbies on the beat, an independent survey has revealed. Chief constables are concerned about meeting costs, at a time when the public is demanding ever more policing. Page 4

Blair offers an olive branch to Short

JOHN RENTOU
Political Correspondent

Tony Blair moved yesterday to disarm the worries of some in his party about his "dictatorial" style, by guaranteeing a Cabinet seat for Clare Short should he become prime minister.

Asked on the BBC's Breakfast with Frost if the outspoken left-winger, demoted last month, would definitely be in his first Cabinet, he replied: "She is entitled as a member of the Shadow Cabinet to be so and I would be delighted to have her there."

A spokesman for the Labour leader later sought to play down the pledge, describing the vexed issue of the rule requiring an incoming Labour prime minister to appoint all the elected members of the Shadow Cabinet to the real Cabinet as "a bridge to cross at the time".

Mr Blair again dismissed the call for higher taxes on the better-off - one of the crimes for which Ms Short was punished. "I don't believe that's the way we need to go now," he said. "I don't believe we're in a situation where you're going to say to people, 'Some people are doing very successfully, so we'll soak the rich to give a few more pounds in benefit to the badly off.'"

The unemployed needed jobs, not a little extra benefit, he said.

The Labour leadership faces a dilemma over its response to likely Conservative tax cuts in the Budget in three months, with some speculation that Kenneth Clarke, the Chancellor, will slash the standard rate of income tax from 24p to 20p, offsetting the £7.6bn cost with less visible tax rises elsewhere.

"When the Government publishes its Budget in November, we will respond, and we will say whether any income level in our view requires higher taxes," said Mr Blair. "We will be entirely open with people."

In a series of interviews yesterday Mr Blair and his deputy John Prescott sent mixed signals about the class identity and ideology of New Labour. Mr Prescott pointedly refused to describe himself as a "social democrat", a label happily accepted by Mr Blair as "interchangeable" with "democratic socialist".

The Labour leader seemed uncomfortable with the characterisation of him by the Labour backbencher Austin Mitchell as "upper class". "I think a lot of rubbish is talked about class," he said.

He was keen to present Labour as a party of the middle class, while not forgetting the "so-called" working classes. "A lot more people are middle class nowadays," Mr Blair told the Sunday Times. "Our task is to allow more people to become middle class. The Labour Party is the party of aspiration."

Lottery millionaires find there's no place like work

IAN FLETCHER and STEVE BOGGAN

More than half the new millionaires created by the national lottery have carried on working, shattering the illusions of dreamers everywhere who would like nothing better than to tell their boss to get lost.

A survey conducted by Camelot, the lottery organisers, shows that winners prefer to keep their jobs and workmates than to turn their back on it.

As seven more punters became millionaires last Saturday, the survey showed that 31 per cent of jackpot winners were still working despite enjoying hefty bank balances. Twenty-two per cent were in the same job, 22 per cent had changed jobs and 7 per cent were in new businesses.

Of these who matched five numbers plus the bonus, the next best thing to the jackpot, most also continued to work, with 23 per cent in the same post, 26 per cent changing jobs and 3 per cent starting new business ventures.

After winning £5.5m in August last year, Mark Lund of Doncaster returned to work and invested in the company which employed him as a labourer.

Bob Westland, of Alfoa, central Scotland, who ran his local village post office, now owns a hotel after winning £3.8m in July 1995. And Shaun Renaud, of Bracknell, Berkshire, now owns a bar and restaurant after winning £2.7m last year. The syndicate of 19 tax officers in Motherwell, Strathclyde, who landed £4.2m last April all went back to their desks and 10 laboratory technicians in Edinburgh returned work after winning £440,281 last November.

Hunter Davies, whose book on lottery winners, Living on the Lottery, is published next month, pointed out that many of the winners would have been unemployed in the first place. "Before [the others] won the lottery, when they were fantasising about it, they say 'You won't see my feet for dust, I'll be in Barbados'. But the first reaction of almost all winners is that they don't want to change their life," he said. One man he spoke to had stopped, however - "because he felt mean keeping someone else out of work".

Mr Davies added that they did not work out of misery. "It's a consolatory myth that people who win are much happier after winning, even a year later, than they were before," he said.

Last Saturday's winning lottery numbers were 27, 3, 5, 47, 14 and 44; the bonus was 43.

Damon Hill pushed out by Williams

Damon Hill, who is poised to win the Formula One drivers' world championship, has been dropped by his Williams-Renault team for next season.

It was revealed yesterday that Frank Williams, the team's leader, had ended negotiations over a new contract with Hill last week. The British driver had been seeking an improvement to his present 12-month deal, believed to be worth $7.5m (£5m), and was understood to be requesting $12m.

It had been rumoured that Williams was not prepared to go beyond $8m, but it became clear yesterday that money had not been the key issue. Hill's representative, Michael Breen, said that the driver had been prepared to continue negotiating, but Williams had decided to end the talks.

It is believed Williams may have been planning for some time to replace Hill. According to sources inside Formula One, Williams agreed a deal last year with the German driver Heinz-Harald Frentzen to drive for his team next year.

If Hill wins the championship - he leads by 13 points, with three races remaining - he will be the fourth Williams driver to leave the team with the world title in the past nine years, following Nelson Piquet, Nigel Mansell and Alain Prost.

In Moldova, England's footballers started Glenn Hoddle's term as national team manager and their own 1998 World Cup qualifying campaign with an unspectacular 3-0 win. After a shaky start, goals from Nick Barmby, Paul Gascoigne and the new captain, Alan Shearer, saw England home.

Drug dealers' release sparks row

Legal Affairs Editor

Michael Howard, the Home Secretary, came under heavy fire yesterday for authorising the release of two convicted drug dealers who had served barely 12 months of their 18-year jail sentences.

The surprise appearance of John Haase, 46, and Paul Bennett, 32, on the streets of Liverpool last week has angered members of the law enforcement agencies after their jailing in 1995 for their part in a £15m

"Turkish connection" heroin smuggling ring. The pair, who pleaded guilty, were among eight defendants sentenced by Judge David Lynch in 1995. But the judge later wrote to the Home Secretary requesting a reduction to five years.

The Home Office said that the men had provided information to Customs during the investigation which was seen as a major breakthrough in the war against drugs. It was not clear yesterday, however, whether the information related wholly to the specific facts of their case.

Mr Howard defended his actions despite his proposals to get tough on drug crime. Interviewed on BBC Radio 4's The World This Weekend, he said the judge had told him that were it not for the special circumstances that existed in this case - in terms of the lives of the men and safeguarding future operations - he would have passed a sentence of five years instead of 18.

"Under the existing law I was specifically requested by the judge to put right what he had not been able to do... Is it seriously suggested that I should have ignored that request from the judge?" he demanded.

The affair none the less resurrects the spectre of the discredited "supergrass tariff" under which criminals used to be given lighter sentences in return for turning Queen's evidence, and the subsequent practice of dropping charges in return for information. The difference appears to have been that these two men were never identified as informants, hence the heavy initial sentence.

The two men were released after just over a year because of the impact of parole and the two years they had spent on remand. Mr Howard challenged one of his critics, John Prescott, Labour's deputy leader, to say whether he would have ignored advice from the trial judge that the proper sentence was five years.

However, the deal is open to the criticism that it was done behind closed doors, against a background of the sale of huge quantities of heroin and fear of gangland violence. Haase has a conviction for armed robbery and concern over security at the committal proceedings at Liverpool magistrates' court was such that armed officers in bullet-proof vests were on guard.

George Howarth, a Merseyside MP and a Labour home affairs spokesman, said: "Given the recent history on Merseyside of armed violence, which is closely associated with drug barons, I find the decision surprising... Understandably, local people are dismayed. I will be writing to Mr Howard seeking an explanation and an assurance that he has taken steps to safeguard the public from these potentially dangerous criminals."

SIGNIFICANT SHORTS

Police investigating the disappearance of brother and sister Tim and Jodi Loughlin were last night understood to be examining the body of a young boy found on a beach. Tim, four, and Jodi, six, vanished from a beach at Holme near Hunstanton, Norfolk two weeks ago, a day after starting their holiday.

Jodi's body was found washed up on a beach between Sheringham and Weybourne - about 30 miles from Holme - on Friday. It is understood that a boy's body was discovered yesterday on a beach in Sheringham. A spokesman for Norfolk police said he could make no official comment. Earlier in the day, a bone, found on the beach, had been discounted from the inquiry after a pathologist's examination showed it was not human. Jojo Moyes

Six young music fans died in a head-on collision near the Somerset town of Frome yesterday. The four men and two women - aged 18 to 25 - were returning from the One World music festival, near Nunney Catch services on the A361, about five miles from the market town.

Police believe that their blue and silver Ford Fiesta crossed the carriageway to collide head-on with a white Transit van travelling in the opposite direction on the A361. The Fiesta spun round in the roadway to mount a grass verge, striking two men who were walking there. One of the walkers was seriously injured, receiving chest, leg, head and abdomen injuries. He was airlifted to the Frenchay Hospital, Bristol, where he was in critical condition last night.

Town centres are failing to cater for Sunday shoppers, who are increasingly travelling to out-of-town superstores, according to a survey published today. High streets which do not offer department stores and big-name favourites on Sundays risk losing customers altogether, it said.

Stocking up on groceries is the most popular pursuit for Sunday shoppers, with visits to DIY and garden centres in second and third places. But fewer than 10 per cent of Sunday shoppers visit town centres on the Sabbath, the survey for property consultants Healey and Baker showed.

One in four women smoke throughout pregnancy despite the increased risk of miscarriage or still-birth, a new study reveals. A third miss out on crucial preparation by not planning their baby, according to the survey of 400 pregnant women.

The study, launched at the start of National Pregnancy Week, reveals widespread ignorance about pregnancy and the risks to the unborn child. More than one in five women are unaware that it is safe and beneficial to continue normal exercise during pregnancy, and one in three do not know about taking folic acid before conception and in the early stages of pregnancy to reduce the risk of the baby developing Spina Bifida.

Police continued to question two men arrested in connection with the murder of schoolgirl prostitute Lucy Burchell. The men were yesterday being interviewed at separate police stations in Birmingham, after raids on two addresses in the city on Saturday. Police refused to comment on whether the arrested men were involved, either as pimps or clients, in the seedy underworld in which Lucy had become embroiled.

The 16-year-old's badly decomposed body was discovered in undergrowth near the Tower Ballroom on Reservoir Road, Edgbaston, Birmingham, by two sea cadets on 20 August. Lucy, who lived with her parents in Great Wyldes, Staffordshire, died only days before she would have collected her GCSE results. She had passed all eight.

Work has begun on the prototype for a £210m "green guardian" in space. Anglo-French space specialists Matra Marconi are the prime contractors for the ASAR sensor which will be the largest fixture on Europe's biggest spacecraft, Envisat 1. Construction has started at their Portsmouth plant on the Advanced Synthetic Aperture Radar for the European Space Agency.

The design will enable almost the entire globe to be scanned in a day, providing radar information at global, national or regional level. Tasks will vary from measuring the height of ocean waves to charting the polar caps or sea ice. It can also plot large-scale desert erosion or crop rotation in individual fields. It can be targeted to provide information on the effects of natural or man-made disasters such as tornadoes or erupting volcanoes, floods or oil-slicks.

The start of the new school year is an expensive time for parents, with the cost of kitting children out with uniforms, games kit, stationery and text books a massive £630.

A survey of nearly 700 parents for Family Circle magazine found that more than half struggled financially in the back-to-school period. But parents were still keen to stick to tradition, even though a school uniform cost the average household more than £300.

King Rat defies death threat

DAVID MCKITTRICK
Ireland Correspondent

The leading Protestant militant Billy Wright defied the loyalist paramilitary death threat against him at the weekend by appearing at a loyalist function to declare that he had no intention of leaving Northern Ireland.

His stance has upped the stakes in the test of willpower between him and his former associates in the Ulster Volunteer Force, who last week ordered him to leave by midnight on Saturday or face "summary justice".

Mr Wright, a former UVF prisoner who is known as "King Rat", appeared dressed in a shirt emblazoned with the words "Mid-Ulster UVF - for God and Ulster - simply the best". He is claiming there is widespread support for him in his dispute with the leadership of the UVF and the other loyalist paramilitary organisations.

Mr Wright was cheered by more than 200 people who had gathered at a club in his home town of Portadown, Co Armagh, for a function to raise funds for the family of a UVF prisoner. He declared: "I believe that the huge crowd vindicates my belief that what I am saying is correct and my assessment of the situation is correct." He pledged to "defend the loyalist cause as long as I live".

The Ulster Unionist leader David Trimble at the weekend recommended mediation in the affair, which has come to threaten the loyalist ceasefire and could affect the inter-party talks due to re-start in Belfast next Monday.

Appealing against any use of violence, Mr Trimble said: "The loyalist paramilitary groups have, by sustaining their ceasefire, gained the high ground and the political parties associated with them have been enabled to make a valuable contribution to the political process. These achievements should not be put at risk."

Members of Mr Trimble's party and of the Rev Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionist party have questioned whether the smaller loyalist parties which have associations with the UVF and other groups should be allowed back to the conference table while death threats are being made.

Concern has also been voiced by the Irish government, with the Taoiseach, John Bruton, calling for the lifting of the death threat. He said: "Politics is a democratic business, where one must be willing to allow others to express their views in an open and free way."

There are also worries that the Wright affair could spark off a feud between the Mid-Ulster UVF and other loyalists.

The extent of the support for Mr Wright is unclear, though many loyalist activists are evidently uneasy about the idea of exiling or killing someone whom they regard as a stalwart of Protestant paramilitarism.

Billy Hutchinson, one of the leaders of the UVF-inspired Progressive Unionist party, revealed at the weekend that police recently warned him that his life was in danger from the Mid-Ulster UVF.

Mr Wright's supporters are planning a rally in support of him in Portadown on Wednesday night.

Royal Black Preceptory demonstrations in a number of areas of Northern Ireland passed off peacefully at the weekend, although nationalists held protests in a number of towns.

Unions fear Blair climbdown on rights

JOHN RENTOUL
Political Correspondent

Trade union leaders are becoming increasingly concerned that Tony Blair is willing to shift policy in favour of employers, as Labour prepares to reveal backing from leading business figures.

Union sources have told The Independent that they fear the Labour leader may be planning to water down his commitment to the European Social Chapter in a speech to business people on Wednesday.

Their suspicions have been fuelled by Labour's energetic courting of business leaders. Following yesterday's publication of names of donors giving more than £5,000 in 1995, endorsements from business people and some 1996 donors will be announced in the next few weeks.

Mr Blair also offended trade unionists yesterday by telling postal workers - on strike today - that they had a "pretty good deal" on the table, and reiterating the need for their union to have the consent of its members in prolonging the dispute.

But a Sunday Times survey of 50 chief executives of top 250 FTSE companies suggests Mr Blair does not face massive hostility to his policies. Twenty-two said they thought the Social Chapter would not cost jobs, and 24 backed the minimum wage.

In the North-west last week Mr Blair picked up the unreported endorsement of John Moores, the Littlewoods director and son of the company's founder, Sir John Moores. Speaking at a Labour fund-raising dinner in Manchester, the Eton-educated Mr Moores backed a minimum wage and the European Social Chapter. "I look forward to a Labour government," he said.

A British Institute of Management survey of managers published today suggests Labour support among them has doubled from 12 per cent in 1992 to 25 per cent now. The Tories have 43 per cent and the Liberal Democrats 15 per cent.

A source close to the leader of one big union said of Labour's drive to woo business: "It's the tone and the joy with which it's done which rankles, and the naivety of thinking that you can do it without any political pay-backs which is worrying."

Unions point out that about three-quarters of Labour's funding still comes from them, if the general election fighting fund is included.

But Labour's biggest-ever donation, made public over the weekend, was the £1m from Political Animal Lobby, an organisation campaigning for a ban on hunting.

Labour's list of 17 donors who gave more than £5,000 last year included several unions and only four companies: £30,000 from GLC Ltd, a fund management company run by Lawrence Staden, a 35-year-old City trader who earns £1m a year, £25,000 from Pearson, publishers of the Financial Times; £20,000 from TU Fund Management, the trade union trust company; and £7,500 from Tate and Lyle.

Fabian Hamilton, 40, was chosen as Labour candidate for Leeds NE last night, in place of Liz Davies, the left-winger sacked by Mr Blair last summer.

Computer finds right ingredient

GLENDA COOPER

Machines are taking over from mankind's taste buds. Artificial intelligence will soon be used to detect how extra-virgin olive oil really is or whether raspberry jam has been made with strawberries.

Complicated software programmes known as Artificial Neural Networks (ANNs) will be increasingly used by the turn of the century to identify adulterated food and rogue ingredients, according to the Institute of Food Research which is holding its Food Authenticity '96 conference at Norwich this week.

Reg Wilson, head of the food composition and authenticity group at the institute, said there had been an "explosion" in the use of artificial intelligence in the last couple of years.

An ANN is a piece of software which learns from past experiences. It is so called because it emulates, in a limited way, the workings of the brain. In the brain, individual cells called neurons interact, sending and receiving messages to and from thousands of other neurons.

By feeding in large amounts of data ANNs can be trained to identify chemical patterns in the same way that the brain can be trained to recognise the complex shapes of people we know.

ANNs have been used in the US to hunt for tax-evaders and in Singapore to investigate stock market fraud but now they are being used to make sure that the food you buy is free of adulterated ingredients. This may help prevent such scandals as the discovery of benzene in Perrier in 1990 and antifreeze in Austrian wine in 1985.

To take the example of raspberry puree, used to make jam, profiles of hundreds of chemical specimens are fed into the ANN and it can be trained to recognise the chemical "fingerprint" of a raspberry.

Currently samples of food arriving at factories have to be sent for time-consuming tests which can take a week and which cost around £500. The ANN test, however, could be conducted at the factory in just 15 minutes. After an outlay of £100,000 to create the programme costs around £30 per test. The IFR hopes that this package will soon be commercialised.

Other foods that are likely to benefit are coffee, cheese, where cheaper cows' milk is added to goats' or sheep's milk, and olive oil.

Student culture sets races apart

Britain's brightest black and Asian students are choosing to avoid traditional universities because of their hard-drinking, rugby-club image, a report reveals today.

Many feel that they operate a white "old boys" network which also extends to the search for jobs after graduating, according to the research by the Institute for Employment Studies. This leads to students from ethnic minority groups being more likely to get lower-grade degrees and lower-paid jobs than white graduates.

The students felt that even those with the best degrees ended up taking jobs which were below them - often for companies that wanted a "black face" to boost their image.

The research showed that ethnic minority students were more likely to go to "new" universities, despite the fact that many had the same or better A-level grades than whites who went to "old" universities.

The IES studied questionnaires from 1,177 graduates from two old and two new universities, then followed up by analysing 272 individuals.

Ethnic minorities make up 12 per cent of Britain's students - even though they represent a little over 6 per cent of the population. But they make up 30 per cent of some former polytechnics which have been converted into universities.

Institute research fellow Ivana La Vall said: "There is a class and cultural difference at old universities which affects minorities. Many have told us they felt under pressure to 'act white' as they put it. Asian girls who wore traditional dresses felt uneasy. They also felt it was hard to explain that they did not want to go to the pub all night and that their culture meant they did not drink and went home early."

"Even black students at old universities did not like the rugby-club culture and felt isolated. It can be a class issue for many from, say, inner cities. "Some told us they felt the old universities operated an old white-boys network. Many felt the same discrimination when looking for work."

Forty per cent of ethnic minority students had to make 15 or more applications before getting a job, compared to around 25 per cent of whites. The average Asian or black graduate took 4.6 months to find their first permanent job compared to 3.9 months for whites.

The number of police officers in England and Wales has dropped in the past year despite government pledges to get more bobbies on the beat, a survey by The Independent reveals.

Chief constables are becoming increasingly concerned about being able to meet growing costs, including the expense of new protective equipment and computers, at a time when the public is demanding ever more policing.

A survey of all the police forces in Britain shows that more than 40 per cent of the 43 constabularies in England and Wales have lost officers during the past year leaving the total strength down by 57 to about 127,000. This follows the announcement by John Major at last year's Tory party conference to provide funding for an extra 5,000 officers during the next three years. Michael Howard, the Home Secretary, has also bragged that funding for the forces in England and Wales rose by £240m to £6.8bn this year.

An additional £20m was made available this year which is supposed to provide an extra 1,000 officers. Although the drop recorded by The Independent may be small any evidence that numbers are declining rather than increasing will be very damaging to the Government's claim to be the party of law and order in the run-up to the election.

Every force in Britain, except Avon and Somerset which said its current force strength was "confidential", provided their latest year-on-year comparison. The largest cuts have been for Merseyside police, Cumbria, Lincolnshire, Metropolitan, South Wales, Staffordshire, Suffolk, and Thames Valley.

The eight Scottish forces have fared slightly better, but only with a net increase of 168 officers.

Part of the problem is that some police chiefs, who have recently been given the power to decide exactly how they spend their budgets, are using their funds to buy equipment rather than officers. This has been exacerbated by a series of new developments for which no extra buildings and technology in order to pay for the 5,000 promised extra officers. He also added that all forces are so overstretched because of a lack of resources that they sometimes cannot send officers to serious accidents. "The police service everywhere in the country is feeling overrun," he said.

A further problem is the growing bill for police pensions. In the past, contributions from officers' salaries covered the money paid out to pensioners but in recent years the cost of benefits has steadily outstripped the value of money paid in. The deficit, which is £800m this year, is already more than 12 per cent of the total £6.5bn revenue, and is predicted to reach £1bn by the turn of the century.

However some forces have increased their civilian numbers - although others have taken significant cuts - which has freed more constables to work the beat and carry out operations.

During the survey Merseyside police, which has suffered a drop of 292, said that the decline was due to reduced funding. "We would very much like to have more officers," said a spokesperson, while Derbyshire constabulary, which has seen a cut of 32, said its position was "not improving". Dorset has a recruitment freeze "for financial reasons" but Lincolnshire (a deficit of 48) promised a new recruitment drive. South Wales (-75) cited a "financial crisis" and Suffolk (-60) said that although it had money for an extra 35 officers it had "budgetary problems" and may have to spend the money on other things.

other things. Ray White, Chief Constable of Dyfed Powys, and vice president of the Association of Chief Police Officers, said: "There are always going to be fluctuations in the level of manpower ... some forces have to catch up a long way in terms of technology and it may well be that some chief constables are giving priority to this in the short

A Home Office spokesman said: "Recruitment is a matter for chief constables. Extra money is being made available for more officers, but it is up to police chiefs what they do with it."

The fame dividend: Stars' huge pay increases put them among the fat cats

BARRIE CLEMENT and STEVE BOGGAN

He may be a bumbling oaf on television but in the boardroom Rowan Atkinson, alias Mr Bean, hatches the kind of money-making schemes of which Blackadder would be proud.

The comedian is one of a growing number of performers whose annual pay tops £1m and whose pay rises rival those of the most obese of City fat cats.

The latest survey by the Labour Research Department into directors' pay shows that more and more singers, comedians and actors are paying themselves as directors through companies, enjoying rises of up to 180 per cent a year.

Atkinson, who gave himself a 17 per cent increase to £1,341,750 through his company Hindmeck, has benefited enormously from the international success of Mr Bean, which has generated video sales of more than 2 million. His success means that last year he was paid more than Paul McCartney, even though the former Beattie gave himself a 180 per cent rise, to £869,455, through his company MPL Communications. He and his fellow Beattie, George Harrison, and Yoko Ono, the widow of John Lennon, stand to make more millions from the three-part Anthology. As directors of Apple Corps, Ono and Harrison last year paid themselves £2,692,250 each, a rise of 78 per cent on the previous year.

More, more, more: Paul McCartney's pay has risen to £869,455, while Elton John took £10,417,942

The biggest pop earner last year was Elton John, who paid himself £10,417,942 through Happenstance/J. Bondi Ltd, with a 2 per cent pay rise.

Other artists managed to give themselves enormous pay packets while taking cuts in salary. Sir Andrew Lloyd Webber, of Really Useful/Escaway, took a cut of 65 per cent but still found himself on £6,134,682. Phil Collins a reduction of 73 per cent but paid £5,916,160; and Eric Clapton a drop of 56 per cent but paid £5,880,330. The pay of Mark Knopfler slid by 3.6 per cent to £2,755,000.

Elsewhere, the pay of senior executives at quoted companies already on more than £500,000 a year has risen by an average 15.9 per cent compared with the previous year's 10.1 per cent, according to the union-funded research. The average outside the boardroom is about 3 per cent.

Of the 175 top directors found by Labour Research, 106 enjoyed increases of more than 10 per cent, while 20 saw their pay more than double. The highest rise was awarded to Sam Chisholm, chief executive of British Sky Broadcasting, whose 609 per cent increase took his pay to £4,716,000.

Ian McCartney, Labour's employment spokesman, said that increasing numbers of individual shareholders were contacting the party to express their exasperation at the "huge" increases enjoyed by the top directors. "This has become the unacceptable face of corporate Britain," he said. "It's a question of boom in the boardroom and bust for the workforce."

Tobacco firm funds British nicotine study

CHARLES ARTHUR Science Editor

A scientist studying the effect of nicotine on brain cells yesterday defended a £100,000 grant she has received from British American Tobacco - one of the world's biggest cigarette producers - towards the costs of her research.

Susan Wonnacott said scientists were forced to accept such grants because rejecting them would starve Britain's future science base, by denying experience to graduate scientists.

Last week, the announcement that BAT had funded work by the Medical Research Council looking at the effects of nicotine on disorders such as Alzheimer's disease caused a huge row, leading to condemnation by senior academics and expressions of regret by researchers at the MRC.

In her laboratory at the University of Bath's School of Biology and Biochemistry, Dr Wonnacott said: "I think most people would prefer not to take grants that can be misconstrued by the public. But at the same time, we have a responsibility to try to maintain a career structure for graduate scientists."

The two-year grant of £100,000 from BAT, which runs out this month, was about 15 per cent of her overall costs - "enough to employ one post-doctoral scientist."

Dr Wonnacott is one of a handful of scientists in the country doing detailed work on nicotine's effects. It is an enormously specialist field, but could yield knowledge about addiction, the treatment of a wide range of illnesses, and even why some things please us and others don't.

Without the funding, she could not have employed the scientist to assist on the project. "We're in something of a cleft stick in universities, because there are so few sources of funding," she said. "Government cutbacks have made life so difficult. Suppose you've got a laborary where a post-doctoral scientist is working for three or four years, and your grant is coming to an end. If you can keep them in employment by getting an industry grant, you do."

But such rows now seem inevitable. Industrial funding of university research has more than tripled in the past decade, following repeated cuts by the Government in the grants made to universities. Some are now uneasy about the possible distortions of science that might follow. The MRC's involvement with BAT is only the most recent example.

Many scientists are worried about the fact that industrial tague over cheaper alternatives made by other companies. The study concluded it did not, and that US health costs could be cut by $356m annually.

However, Boots objected to the work and used a clause in its funding contract with the UCSF scientist - specifying that publication could only follow Boots's written consent - to block the publication of the paper in JAMA, despite the journal having carefully checked the quality of the study and deciding that it met scientific standards.

The paper has never been published and Boots subsequently sold off its pharmaceutical arm. Last week, its UK head office said it no longer sponsors research in universities.

UK university advisers are aware of the potential pitfalls. "I'm sure most people have taken the Boots case as an example of what can happen if they don't take great care," said Jane Lee, corporate affairs director of the MRC. "It illustrates the traps you can fall into."

The MRC and Dr Wonnacott insist that BAT's funding contract is not onerous. "There are no strings attached - not on the research itself or on publication, nor did they demand to be acknowledged in any paper I write, or to see the publication in advance," she said.

So far, there has been no instance in the UK of a dispute like that between Boots and the USCF, according to Michael Powell, policy adviser at the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, which advises universities. "Certainly, universities here are aware of these issues, and try to ensure that these things are sorted out at the contract stage," he said.

The funding of research by tobacco companies seems likely to rumble on. "The smoking debate arouses a lot of passions that make it seem black and white," said Dr Wonnacott. "But there are grey aspects in doing research."

2 for 1 Comedy Tapes Offer

THE INDEPENDENT

If laughter really is the best medicine, then The Independent and the Independent on Sunday are about to improve your health dramatically.

In conjunction with Laughing Stock, we are giving you the chance to buy up to 20 audio comedy cassettes on a 'two for the price of one' basis. Two double cassettes cost £8.99, two single cassettes £6.99, or choose one of each for just £7.99. All prices include postage and packing. Our list includes some of the country's top comedians from Paul Merton, Eddie Izzard and Jo Brand, to timeless classics such as Tony Hancock and Peter Cook. So next time you're sitting in rush hour traffic, say goodbye to road rage and have a good laugh instead.

How to Apply
To obtain your two audio comedy cassettes for the price of one, start by collecting three differently numbered tokens from the seven we are publishing in The Independent and the Independent on Sunday. Today we are printing Token 3; Token 4 will be printed in tomorrow's Independent.

Send your tokens, together with a completed order form and cheque, to the address below. An order form was printed yesterday and will appear again tomorrow and on Friday 6 September. With your three tokens you can order as many cassettes as you wish in multiples of two. Photocopies of tokens and order forms are not acceptable.

When ordering, please allow 28 days for delivery from the date of your order. No responsibility will be accepted for delays caused by industrial action within the postal service. Orders must be received by 30 September 1996. Cassettes are subject to availability. Offer available to readers in the UK and Republic of Ireland only. If you have any queries concerning receipt of your order, please call our helpline on 0181 699 9922. Please make cheques payable to 'Independent Comedy Offer', P.O. Box 3763, London SE23 2DQ.

Labour warns of acute teacher shortage

FRAN ABRAMS
Education Correspondent

Labour has warned that teacher shortages could soon reach crisis level. The numbers training to teach early years and primary education are falling despite government plans to offer nursery education to all four-year-olds next year, according to figures released to the party. The figures also show that in secondary schools the numbers teaching maths, science and English have fallen continuously over the past decade.

At the same time, the number of pupils in the system is growing. Last year, there were an extra 100,000 children in school, and a similar increase is expected in the coming year.

David Blunkett, Labour's education spokesman, said the school population was set to rise by 3.5 per cent in the next five years. "The Conservatives' failure to plan properly for our children's future has created a ticking time bomb in terms of a future shortage of suitably qualified teachers in key subject specialisms," he said. "No wonder the Government have allowed the voucher scheme to operate without a qualified teacher being in charge of designated nursery education provision."

Mr Blunkett's figures, supplied in answer to a parliamentary question, show that the number of new students entering primary and nursery teacher training dropped from 16,600 in 1992 to 13,600 in 1995. Government targets for recruitment, which were set at 12,100 last year and were easily met, have been cut this year to 11,500 and are set to rise to 12,200 next year.

In maths, the number of qualified teachers dropped from 47,900 in 1984 to 38,100 in 1992, while in English the number dropped from 54,600 to 40,100 over the same period. In science, there were 49,600 teachers in 1988 and 46,200 in 1992.

Mr Blunkett has accused the Government of failing to act to solve the problem, which is bound to become more acute as pupil numbers rise. At the same time, more teachers are opting to take early retirement - 11,500 in 1994-95. There is also a very high drop-out rate among teacher-training students, with 21 per cent failing to complete Bachelor of Education courses and 13 per cent dropping out of post-graduate training courses. However, a spokesman for the Department for Education and Employment denied that there was any problem with recruitment. "Schools are having no difficulties in recruiting teachers. The vacancy rate is the lowest it has ever been. At the same time, the number of classroom assistants is rising. There is no teacher shortage," he said.

and CHARLIE BAIN

The idea was met with raucous laughter. "Park Hill flats, listed as an important part of England's heritage. It's got to be a joke," said Royce Dixon, whose butcher's shop looks out on to the grey concrete walls of the high-rise Sheffield estate built 40 years ago. "The people who think up these ideas should try living here. Most people on the estate would rather see it pulled down than listed."

Today, Dr Martin Cherry, head of listing for English Heritage, is recommending that Park Hill is given Grade II* status, protecting it from demolition or unsympathetic redevelopment.

The first estate in the country to have pedestrian "streets in the sky", it is among 18 other public housing schemes, 18 private housing schemes and 30 private houses being recommended for listing as outstanding examples of modern architecture at an exhibition in London this week.

If Dr Cherry's recommendation is approved by Virginia Bottomley, Secretary of State for National Heritage, Park Hill - home to about 2,000 council tenants - will become Britain's largest modern listed building.

"Park Hill has been likened to a medieval fortress, a glittering cliff face of windows," said Dr Cherry. "The fact that it is only 40 years old and not 400 makes it no less important. It is a magnificent structure."

Mr Dixon laughed even louder. "It's a fortress all right. Kids are always throwing things from the battlements. Televisions, bits of concrete, you name it ... Quite a few of the flats are empty and the council doesn't seem in too much of a hurry to fill them. And the concrete is crumbling. Men abseil down the buildings, removing the loose concrete about twice a year."

When Park Hill was first built, it basked in the glory of being the first estate in England to include pubs, shops and other amenities such as a community centre. Architects came from all over the world to see it, and it still attracts international attention, said Dr Cherry. Today, many of the shops and a few of the flats are empty, or hidden behind heavy shutters to protect them against vandalism.

Christine Karma, 41, who has lived on the estate for 18 years, said: "The people who first lived here kept the estate in an immaculate condition, but they have grown old and moved away. Now the estate is troubled by vandals and it has become run down. But I like living here because there is still a strong sense of community. The people make this place special, not the buildings."

Among the other council housing schemes being put forward for listing this week at the exhibition at the Royal Institute of British Architects' Centre in Portland Place, is Lillington Gardens in Fimbo, hailed by many as Britain's first successful alternative to the tower block. None of the estate's complex arrangement of flats and maisonettes, set around a formal garden, are over nine storeys high, and it set a trend which spread throughout Britain in the 1960s. Parts of the Alton Estate in Roehampton, south-west London, the flagship project of London County Council's 1950s housing programme are also being put forward for listing, as is the Golden Lane Estate in the City of London.

Among the 18 private housing schemes being put forward are the flats in St James's Place, central London, the first development for the luxury market designed by Sir Denys Lasdun, and Langham House Close, Ham Common, south-west London, the first work by the Stirling Gowan partnership. The use of both brick and concrete to express the structure of Langham House influenced a whole generation of architects.

Among the post-war private houses is Farnley Hey, near Huddersfield. With its contrast of natural brick and stone with Formica, it is perhaps Britain's best-known example of the American "contemporary" style.

Penal groups attack plan to name young offenders

Legal Affairs Editor

Proposals for the worst young offenders to be "named and shamed" by giving magistrates the power to remove their traditional anonymity came under attack yesterday from penal groups.

Abolition of automatic anonymity for the under-18s could be unveiled at this autumn's Tory party conference by Michael Howard, the Home Secretary. The initiative would be designed to humiliate young tearaways and thugs and shame their parents into taking more responsibility, but would be a radical departure from the 60-year-old rule that juveniles should not be named, except in exceptional circumstances, such as where anonymity would cause the offender an injustice.

Paul Cavatone, chairman of the Penal Affairs Consortium, the umbrella group for penal organisations, said: "The reason why the names of juvenile offenders are not normally published is that it can seriously hinder their future rehabilitation. This is as true now as it was when the rule was introduced in 1933.

"If the Government scraps the rule, it will be giving a knee-jerk punitive response priority over the prospect of rehabilitating young offenders."

But some party strategists hope, however forlornly, that the threat of public exposure in cases of serious offences could force parents to take a hand in reforming teenage behaviour. This would put a hard-core of young offenders on a par with the handful of children who appear at the Crown Court for the gravest offences.

Penal reform groups will argue strongly, however, that the public branding of young criminals at an early age will encourage many that they have nothing to gain by trying to reform. Jack Straw, Labour's home affairs spokesman, has already published proposals to give youth courts the power to pass a new sentence of naming offenders, but this would only apply to 16- to 18-year-olds. A party spokesman said: "There are a number of serious questions about the under-16s. For most young people, the effect of coming into contact with the criminal justice system for the first time is a deterrent."

Labour is sympathetic to the complaint that hardened young offenders cock a snook at the system and treat it as a joke, but insists the root of the problem is the huge delays in bringing them to justice.

It has called for fast-track court processing for persistent offenders, the formalising of the cautioning system so that offenders are given a clear "final warning", and a sentencing process based on the Scottish scheme. Such a scheme would involve an inquiry by magistrates, welfare workers, teachers and other community representatives to devise the best sentence for a particular offender. It would come into play immediately a guilty plea is entered, whereas the current adversarial court system encourages offenders to plead not guilty, delaying decisions about their treatment.

DAILY POEM

From Rome the Sorceress

By André Frénaud

*A giant marble foot, preserved with no body as a statue to amuse us, a tortoise bearing the world, an elephant beneath its column, a small child playing ... And a tender terrace, embracing with geranium
the ancient laudatory tomb, the slow fountain rising, the whisper from basin to basin between the stairways, between the statues seen at the sky's end,
a turtle-dove and a fiasco on the step.*

*Who wanted
fragments of hill and the beauty of gates in this palace? Who wanted nights exposed to beasts in this palace?
I remember: a pit at the roadside, near the fig tree. Then there was a glut of animals laying hold of one another, long white bodies in the mud, the glistering back, someone's hair ... Would it be there? I have dreamed so much.*

La Sorcière de Rome was written in 1973 by one of France's most distinguished poets and has recently been translated by Peter Broom for the Bloodaxe Contemporary French Poets series. Frénaud first became known for his wartime poetry, written from a German labour camp. Rome the Sorceress is his richest and most disturbing work, in which the city becomes a focus for a profound meditation on culture and barbarism, faiths and revolts, cruelties and aspirations.

Conflict in Kurdistan: Turkey demands immediate withdrawal, while US sends reinforcements to Gulf in warning to Saddam

Terrified Kurds flee huge Iraq offensive

HUGH POPE
Istanbul

Western policy towards northern Iraq lay in ruins yesterday as Iraqi armour dug in outside the Iraqi Kurdish capital of Arbil and their new Iraqi Kurdish allies established themselves inside the city of one million people.

"All the English and American aid workers have left. From time to time, there is still sporadic gunfire," said a UN official near the city reached by satellite telephone.

Turkish reporters who had been in the city at the time of the joint attack by the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) and their Iraqi backers on Saturday said it had all happened so suddenly that the Iraqi Kurdish civilian population had no time to flee.

"We immediately jumped into our cars with the shells exploding around us. But all the exits of the city were blocked. We had to plead to be allowed through," said one.

The Iraqi leadership has said its intervention in northern Iraq was a limited operation and that troops would soon withdraw. Some KDP officials said the withdrawal had already begun, others that they "hoped" it would start soon.

The party has traditionally been perceived as pro-Western, and its spokesman tried hard to justify its alliance with the troops of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

"The KDP move to take control of Arbil was a desperate act to defend itself against mounting Iranian-PUK military pressure to end our movement... the KDP has no intention to invite Iraqi forces back into northern Iraq," he said.

But the Iraqi armour and towed artillery pulled up outside Arbil did not leave yesterday, according to witnesses. And a US military spokesman confirmed that technically the Iraqis had not broken any UN rules, since the only ban is on using warplanes or helicopters north of the 36th parallel.

"We are all waiting for a lead," admitted one American officer as statement after statement from Washington could only talk of ultra-high levels of alertness and possible reinforcements of air bases.

The Turkish military, closely allied to the Americans, has filled all planes flying to the east with security forces to reinforce units on the Iraqi border. Foreign Minister Tansu Ciller yesterday issued a strong demand that Iraqi forces withdraw "immediately".

Turkey does not want to see any repeat of the refugee crisis that followed Saddam Hussein's capture of north Iraq after the Gulf War in 1991, or any chaos that could benefit its own Turkish Kurd rebels. But it is hard to imagine how Ankara can now get involved in an essentially internal Iraqi matter without risking conflict with both Iran and Iraq.

It is also hard to imagine what allied or Turkish forces can attack. The rationale of allied air patrols is to defend Iraqi Kurds from Baghdad, but the KDP, which now "controls" two of the three provinces of Iraqi Kurdistan, Duhok and Arbil, is openly co-operating with it.

The KDP's about-face signals the likely end of the long uphill struggle by Western diplomats to bring the 3.5 million Iraqi Kurds together as a self-sustaining entity. Struggles over trade, money and power have already split them for more than three years.

It is also a heavy blow to the West's use of northern Iraq to exert pressure on Saddam Hussein. That idea was reinforced by unconfirmed reports of a massacre of 97 members of the umbrella opposition group, the Iraqi National Congress, mostly Iraqi army deserters based in a camp east of Arbil near the town of Kussepe.

The KDP's main rivals in the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) pleaded for the US to intervene, saying Iraqi forces were testing their will by shelling the town of Chemochemal, close to their stronghold Sulaymaniyah, capital of the third province of Iraqi Kurdistan.

"I am going to tell you frankly. We are going to wait some days, or let us say one week, to see what the reaction is of the United States and the West. If the West betrays us... we will surely turn to anyone who is ready to help us," PUK leader Jalal Talabani told the BBC. "It means that the West will be finished in the area. The area will be divided into one group pro-Iraqi and one pro-Iranian."

Poser for America as its old nemesis returns

RUPERT CORNWELL
Washington
DAVID USBORNE

The US yesterday sent reinforcements to the Gulf but the Pentagon is giving no sign that military action is imminent, despite the Iraqi onslaught.

With reports still confused, the Clinton administration sent B-52 bombers to the region and readied extra airpower to boost the 200 US aircraft and 23,000 American troops there. Warren Christopher, the Secretary of State, cut short a holiday to return to Washington to consult with advisers, Britain and France and other allies.

On Saturday Mr Clinton expressed "grave concern" but said it would be "premature to speculate on any response we might have". Yesterday his chief of staff, Leon Panetta, said there "would be a response with consequences for Saddam" if he did not withdraw.

What that might be is a mystery: Washington is in a quandary over how to respond to this latest challenge to its credibility in the region. Unlike five years ago, when Iraq's incursions led to the imposition of the "safe haven", the picture is muddled by factional differences between rival Kurdish groups linked to Iran and Iraq.

United Nations diplomats doubted that by invading the safe havens Iraq had explicitly violated individual provisions of any UN Security Council resolutions passed after the 1991 Gulf war. One said: "To be frank, this is a very grey area". Security Council resolutions confer in general terms a responsibility on Baghdad to maintain peace across Iraq and not to repress minorities. The texts provided the US and its allies with diplomatic justification for carving out safe havens within Iraq. The same resolutions are non-specific about what Baghdad may or may not do militarily in the areas. More detailed are the ceasefire agreements negotiated at the end of the war, which include provisions barring the use of Iraqi aircraft in the north but which are not covered by UN authority.

March of misery: Kurds fleeing an earlier incursion by President Saddam. This time, the issues are not so clear-cut. Photograph: Patrick Cockburn

The remoteness of the region would make massive intervention on the ground difficult. If the US is forced to step in directly, most analysts suggested, it should use pinpoint air attacks against the Iraqi armoured columns which have moved across the 36th parallel.

Diplomatic retaliation is also a possibility. The offensive must call into some question the UN permission last month for Iraq to sell $2bn (£1.3bn) of oil to import food and medicine for civilians. Bob Dole, the Republican candidate for the White House in November, said the latest events proved the decision to relax sanctions was "premature and ill-advised", to which Mr Clinton's spokesman, Mike McCurry, said sales were "tightly structured" to humanitarian relief.

Again therefore, Iraq haunts

US politicians in an election season and with it a familiar question: should the US and its allies have finished the job in 1991 by going all the way to Baghdad?

The Kurdish foray is a reminder that despite sanctions, attempted coups, and diplomatic isolation, President Saddam is still very much around, defying prediction after prediction that his demise was imminent. He has already far outlasted his Gulf war nemesis, George Bush, and Mr Clinton has had no more success in dislodging him. Even so, barring disaster, dealing with him should work to the incumbent's advantage, given that in moments of foreign-policy tension, the country rallies behind its president. Handling the crisis endows Mr Clinton, already 15 per cent or more ahead in the polls, with an aura and authority Mr Dole cannot match.

Saudi calls for jihad against US 'crusader'

To the shock of many of his supporters, the Saudi dissident Osama Bin Laden has called for a "holy war" against the US inside Saudi Arabia and for "swift and light forces working in complete secrecy" to strike against what he calls the "crusader" army in the Gulf states.

Parts of the original statement from Mr Bin Laden, the wealthy leader of hundreds of Arab fighters who has returned to live in Afghanistan, where he once fought Soviet troops, were published in Saturday's London edition of Al-Quds al-Arabi but without proof of authenticity.

However, the Independent has confirmed Mr Bin Laden, accused by the US State Department of being "one of the most significant financial sponsors of Islamic extremist activities in the world today", did write the call for jihad (holy war) from Afghanistan on 22 August.

He said "the presence of the American crusader forces in the Muslim Gulf states... is the greatest danger and the largest harm which threatens the world's biggest oil reserve... pushing out this American occupying enemy is the most important duty after the duty of belief in God." He urged the Saudi armed forces to stand aside from the struggle against the Americans, who have about 5,000 military personnel in Saudi Arabia, alongside smaller British and French contingents.

For Mr Bin Laden's supporters among the dissident Saudi "Advice and Reformation Committee" outside Afghanistan, his call was a profound surprise. "We do not think this is the right moment to start a conflict with the (Saudi) regime," one told the Independent yesterday. "Osama has made a detailed, 12-page statement, a major plan to explain the declaration of jihad, a whole project. But we thought we were all agreed that we should try to keep the situation under control in the country, to control the people and not let things get out of hand. I was expecting the concept of jihad in Saudi Arabia to come up a long time ago - but not from us. Saying we have an enemy is one thing but declaring war is something else."

Why Mr Bin Laden chose this moment to make his most extreme remarks about the US presence in the Gulf is unclear. It comes, however, when organisers of the "Rally for Islamic Revival" are planning a major conference of Islamist groups in London on Sunday at which, say some reports, will be shown a videotaped statement from Mr Bin Laden (the Government has told him he will not be allowed in), an interview with Sheikh Omar Abdul Rahman, the Egyptian cleric jailed for alleged involvement in a planned New York bombing, and a phone interview with Ali Belhadi, one of the jailed leaders of the Algerian Islamic Salvation Front, which was banned when it was about to win a second round of elections in 1992.

Mr Bin Laden's colleagues dismiss the report of a videotape message and are mystified by the claim that Sheikh Omar would be able to make a videotape in his US prison. Other Islamist groups express astonishment at the idea that Belhadi, under the constant eye of the Algerian security services, would be able to participate in an interview.

The London conference has nevertheless provoked predictable anger among Arab leaders who claim it will encourage "terrorists" in their own countries. President Hosni Mubarak has complained to Britain that it "will not help the international struggle against terrorism". Algeria's Foreign Ministry has complained that "the commanders, instigators, theoreticians, financiers and zealots of international terrorism" will be taking part.

Up to 80,000 people have died in Algeria's four-year war, in which "Islamists" and death squads have murdered thousands of innocent civilians, by shooting and throat-cutting. Since 1992, more than 1,000 people have been killed in Egypt, mostly policemen and "Islamists" but also foreign tourists, businessmen and at least one US intelligence agent,

The main political groups involved in the Kurdish conflicts

KURDISTAN DEMOCRATIC PARTY

The main protagonist in the latest round of fighting - raising heckles with its sudden tactical alliance with Baghdad. Founded in 1945 by Molla Mustafa Barzani, the Kurdistan Democratic Party is the mother of most other Kurdish parties in Iraq and has affiliates in Iran and Turkey.

In 1970, it secured agreement with Baghdad over self-rule in Kurdish areas as well as a Kurdish role in the Baghdad government. This deal, as with others in the past, collapsed when regional alliances changed.

The current leader, Molla Mustafa Barzani, took over after the death of Molla Mustafa in 1979. Barzani, 50, spent years in exile, living and travelling in the Middle East, the former Soviet Union, Europe and the US. He speaks Farsi, Arabic, and English.

The KDP is seen as a mainly rural party centred on the Barzani tribe. But many educated, urban Kurds also follow Barzani as they see his policies of reconciliation with Baghdad as the only realistic choice. He now controls the central province of Arbil and the north-western province of Duhok, including the border with Turkey, where it charges up to $250,000 per day taxes on the lucrative and semi-legitimate trade between Turkey and Iraq in diesel oil, foodstuffs and medicines. The distribution of these taxes is a main bone of contention with the PUK.

Molla Mustafa Barzani, 'Realist' demands 'reconciliation'

KURDISTAN WORKERS PARTY

The Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK) has played no role in the current fighting, but Turkey fears that the PKK may have the most to gain from renewed tension and chaos in northern Iraq. During its 12-year struggle with government forces in Turkey, the PKK has ruthlessly established itself as the sole rebel movement of the Kurds of Turkey, who are less well-educated but probably four times as numerous, as the Kurds of Iraq. It has recently proved it can run bases for several hundred militants with impunity inside north Iraq.

The PKK recently removed the hammer and sickle from its flag, but it is still a totalitarian, far-left nationalist movement, run by its leader Abdullah Ocalan. Mr Ocalan's main base appears to be in Syria and the organization seems to have training bases, again in Lebanon's Syrian-controlled Bekaa Valley.

The PKK is the only group that has openly advocated a separate state to unite all the 20-25 million Kurds split between Turkey, Iran, Iraq and Syria. Recently it has toned down these demands, but its militant message has found support among Iraqi youth disillusioned with the squabbling of the PUK and the KDP.

Ocalan: wants a state to unite all the Kurds

PATRIOTIC UNION OF KURDISTAN

The PUK has been the losing side in the recent conflict, and is accused by the KDP of growing links over its eastern border with Iran.

It is led by Jalal Talabani, previously a senior KDP member who clashed with Molla Mustafa before setting up the PUK in June 1975. Talabani then joined with Baghdad against the KDP in a feud that lasted into the 1980s. Talabani tried to organise the PUK as a more modern political party than the tribal KDP. He developed broadcast and newspaper outlets to reach educated, urban Kurds with a more left-wing message. But gradually the PUK appeared strongest in eastern Kurdistan where Surani dialect speakers are most populous, while the KDP remained stronger in the Kirmanci-speaking north-west.

Talabani: split with the KDP to form own movement

After the 1991 Gulf war, the PUK appeared reconciled with the KDP. And in 1992 elections, the two parties took 50 seats each in the regional Kurdish government, based in the main city of Arbil. But fighting erupted again in December 1994 when the PUK captured the regional capital Arbil and northern Iraq was in effect split between them.

Chechen 'peace' changes little

PHIL REEVES
Moscow

Russians who believed that Alexander Lebed, the Mr Fix-it of the Kremlin, had finally hurried their dispute with Chechnya, saw their hopes fading this weekend. The rebels' most senior politician made clear that the war may be over, but the battle for independence was not.

Only a day after Mr Lebed had scrawled his name on a peace agreement, Zelimkhan Yandarbiyev, the separatists' self-styled president, was publicly insisting that his followers' demands for total autonomy were unchanged.

Although his remarks may have been an attempt to appease radical factions in the rebel movement who resent making any concessions to the Russians, they are also certain to be seized upon by critics of the accord in Moscow and Chechnya, who - for a variety of reasons - are finding it hard to stomach the sight of Russian troops leaving the war zone.

While many ordinary Russians and Chechens welcome an end to the conflict, whatever the terms, the political response has veered from enthusiasm (from the head of the liberal-leaning Yabloko parliamentary group), to careful praise (from the Prime Minister, Viktor Chernomyrdin), to outright coolness (from a holidaying Mr Yeltsin).

But there is no doubt that Mr Lebed's confident announcement that the "war is over" is regarded with deep alarm and suspicion by others, including powerful elements in the Russian military, who see it as tantamount to defeat, and members of the Moscow-backed Chechen government who now face the wrath of a slice of the Chechen population which believes that it was betrayed. Yesterday there were reports that the puppet government, which was elected by a rigged vote, was planning to resign.

Under the agreement, settlement of Chechnya's political status will be postponed for five years, but it is not clear how it will eventually be determined. The separatists had hoped for a referendum, which would be certain to produce overwhelming support for secession, but it is not clear whether this has been agreed. A poll would meet with resistance in the Kremlin, which has been adamant that, whilst it may be willing to grant considerable autonomy, it will not accept the total separation of Chechnya from the federation.

Mr Yandarbiyev's remarks are further proof that the issue may have been delayed, but it has not been resolved. That may not be the only quarter which presents problems. Mr Yeltsin has so far remained silent about the deal, and is continuing to treat Mr Lebed with all the aloofness of a headmaster dealing with a pushy schoolboy.

According to Mr Chernomyrdin, the President approved a draft of the agreement before Mr Lebed set off for the negotiations. But yesterday he was reportedly asking for details of alterations made during the talks. The President's frostiness has added to the evidence that Mr Yeltsin has no desire to shower garlands on Mr Lebed. But it is also caution politics. All deals on Chechnya can easily explode. Mr Yeltsin knows that it is best not to be standing too close when they do so.

Chirac and Kohl fight to revitalise EMU

IMRE KARACS
Bonn

Facing economic despondency, market turmoil and mounting labour unrest at home, President Jacques Chirac of France came to Bonn last night to seek reassurance from the leader of Europe's largest economy.

For once, President Chirac and Chancellor Helmut Kohl did not disguise the nature of the visit. What had been pencilled in as a routine working trip turned into an anguished discussion about the ever-worsening prospects for European Monetary Union.

Despite the two leaders' avid determination to banish any doubt that EMU will arrive on schedule in 1999, the money markets continue to bet against the project starting on time, just as public misgivings on the Continent are growing.

The markets seem convinced that France will not fulfil the Maastricht criteria in time. The franc has been under attack throughout the summer. A German interest rate cut last month offered only brief respite.

Unfortunately for France, there is little more help that Chancellor Kohl can offer. Bonn is itself in serious danger of exceeding the 3 per cent budget deficit allowed under the rules. Cuts are being prepared to salvage next year's budget but the patience of German workers is running out. Unions have erected a stall opposite the government quarter in Bonn demanding "Jobs and social justice".

Quietly, even Bonn is softening its stance on EMU, ditching demands for a "stability pact" that would penalise profligate member states within it. The markets are wondering whether the target date of 1999 might be ditched next.

Love unites stars of black struggle

Graca Machel and Nelson Mandela

It must have been desperately hard for Graca Machel when her husband died. The plane crash which took the life of Samora Machel, the President of Mozambique, removed one of the most charismatic, intelligent and charming of all of Africa's post-independence leaders, a man whom even Margaret Thatcher found compelling and persuasive despite his Marxism. Perhaps it must have seemed, then, that no-one could ever take his place. But now, the news that has been gossip for the last five years has finally been confirmed: Graca is involved in a relationship with Nelson Mandela.

For months, officials have fenced and hedged when asked about the relationship between the widow of the President of Mozambique and the current President of South Africa, usually resorting to the formula that they were "just good friends". But yesterday, reports in South Africa's Sunday Independent claimed that they were in a "steady relationship".

"President Nelson Mandela is in love. After months of speculation, the Sunday Independent can now confirm that Mandela and Graca Machel... are involved in a steady relationship and are ready to go public. The couple plan to spend as much time together as possible," the paper said. "They plan to spend two weeks of each month together at Mandela's Johannesburg home. Machel will spend the rest of her time in her home country."

Spokesman Parks Mankahlana said: "All I can say is, the story is not untrue."

Graca Machel, 50, is a very popular and important figure in Mozambique. Known as a former Frelimo guerrilla and education minister as well as the widow of the man who brought the country to independence from Portugal, she has worked with the United Nations Children's Fund, headed a UN study on the impact of war on children and is an advocate of women's and children's rights.

The exact cause of the 1986 plane crash which claimed the life of her husband, Samora, was never precisely identified; but it has long been suspected that it was the work of either the South African Government or of terrorists operating on their behalf. It was this which was to bring her together with Mandela. Oliver Tambo, the former ANC leader, became custodian of Machel's seven children. Mandela took over that role in 1990; within two years, the first rumours about their relationship had started to circulate.

Popular: Graca Machel, known as a former Frelimo guerrilla

Mandela, 78, had had a tough time after coming out of prison in February 1990. Despite the international acclaim, his marriage to Winnie was already coming apart at the seams. He had married her in 1958, after divorcing his first wife, Evelyn. Just four years later, he was jailed for 27 years. By the time he emerged from prison, there were already many stories of her ruthlessness, her abuses of authority, her spending, and affairs. Finally, it came to divorce earlier this year, despite Winnie's efforts to prevent it. At the divorce hearing, the freedom fighter who had transformed South Africa said he was "the loneliest man in the world".

But at the very mention of Mrs Machel, his face is said to light up. Their meetings have been the talk of South Africa, with trysts rumoured to have taken place around the world, most recently at the wedding of Robert Mugabe, Zimbabwe's Prime Minister.

So will they marry? Mr Mankahlana said yesterday: "I'm not aware of any marriage plans." He may feel a little reticent about recommending himself so soon after ending one marriage, but Mr Mandela is a family man, and it may well be that they decide to tie the knot. It would be a great marriage, uniting not just two nations, but two heroes of the black liberation struggle in Southern Africa, brought together by the struggle against apartheid.

Israel's foreign minister revealed that Israeli and Palestinian officials were holding secret negotiations and said he expected a breakthrough very soon in the Mideast peace process. David Levy said the talks lasted until 5am yesterday and he believed another session later in the day could lead to overcoming key obstacles. Keeping the Huguenot tradition alive

Every year, French Protestants gather to celebrate their faith and draw strength from their unity, reports Mary Dejevsky in St Jean du Gard

They came from all over France, from Belgium, from Germany and from Switzerland, to profess their faith under the chestnut trees of the high Cévennes, and you could hear the singing, strong and deliberate, from a mile away.

Their cars and buses were parked in neat lines in adjacent fields; everything was clearly signposted and marshalled. They carried their garden chairs and their picnic baskets with them, and settled in perfect order around a shady dell to await the start of the service.

This was the annual gathering of one of France's smaller, but fastest-growing religious minorities: the Protestants. Every year, on the first Sunday in September, these spiritual, and often physical, descendants of the Huguenots meet at the Mas Soubeyran near the town of St Jean du Gard in central southern France, for a day of contemplation, psalm-singing and Bible-reading that recharges their batteries for the year ahead.

"I think we need this assembly," said a matronly woman as she set out her family's picnic. "I think we feel isolated for the rest of the year, and this helps us. We are a small minority, less than a million of us; fewer than the Jews, fewer than the Muslims, and this gives us confidence."

She and her family have been coming to Mas Soubeyran for years; her son-in-law was there for the first time. "I was touched," he said, "to see so many people from so many different places, all come to this small place." They themselves had come from Pau in the Pyrenees and Toulouse in southwestern France. But the registration numbers in the car parks bore witness to many longer journeys than theirs.

France's Protestants have long memories. In daily life, they wear them for the most part lightly, but they are still there. In his sermon, the head of the Protestant Federation of France, Jacques Stewart, warned of the dangers of harbouring vengeful thoughts. But, in some of his few remarks addressed to the current political situation, he condemned the exclusion of particular groups from French society - the poor, the unemployed and immigrants, and called for tolerance.

In a passage which drew a parallel between France's current campaign against illegal immigrants and the fate of the Huguenots in the 17th century, he appealed: "Consider how you can limit or relieve suffering," and "remember what fear of other people can lead to."

Each year, more than 10,000 people come to Mas Soubeyran for the annual assembly. It marks the anniversary of the revocation of Henry IV's Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV in 1685, which ended almost a century of religious tolerance in France, condemned tens of thousands to imprisonment, torture and death, and drove hundreds of thousands into emigration. The Cévennes, and especially the area north of Nîmes, was and remains a prime Protestant stronghold, along with the Isère region around Grenoble. It was to these regions, far from the reach of Paris, and in difficult terrain, that many of the Huguenots fled. And it was here, in what is still termed the "wilderness" of the Cévennes that they held their banned services.

Today, the Protestant villages are easily identified. The signs announcing one's arrival do not read "Messe" or "Eglise", but "Culte" and "Temple" - the Protestant equivalents. And there is something different about the villages themselves: a spare sense of order and propriety, a slight severity, which sets them apart from Catholic southern France.

Something similar could be said of yesterday's gathering at Mas Soubeyran. Seen together against the backdrop of a predominantly Catholic and at least partly Mediterranean country, the Protestants seem serious and introspective, weighed down by responsibility, and just a little dour.

The morning service began with the complete silence of 10,000 people and only the rustle of the wind in the trees. What was striking was the immediate emphasis on sin and personal repentance in a faith where the release of the confessional is not an option. The invocation to "Go in peace and sin no more" was taken as a grave and personal challenge.

Seen as a group, France's Protestants also look different: lighter haired, generally more solid and more north European than the rest of the French population. And their hymns are in the heavier Germanic style of "Now thank we all our God", not the lighter, Latin style sung by French Catholics. Asked whether, as Protestants, they felt different from Catholics, every one I asked gave a decisive yes. "We're quite different, in our attitudes and our behaviour," an elderly woman said. "At least, we hope we are."

That unstated sense of superiority in personal and ethical values may help to explain why many French Catholics admit to finding Protestants "difficult". Increasingly, though, Protestants are also being regarded as having particularly high standards of honesty and integrity. The fact that the Socialist leader, Lionel Jospin, was known to be a Protestant was regarded as an electoral plus during last year's presidential campaign, although it was not something he flaunted.

The sense of integrity is also given as one of the reasons for the appeal of Protestantism in France today. As Catholicism languishes and churches stand empty for lack of congregations and an even greater lack of priests, the Protestant church has been gaining several thousand members a year.

Whisper it: Blair may have to raise taxes

Our front page calculation is simple and it is damning. The Government's own figures are above suspicion, the GCSE to do the addition. Public expenditure has been sustained only by massive borrowing and the application of the huge, one-off proceeds of privatisation and North Sea oil. As a party of financial probity the Conservatives have been living a lie. As a nation we have, to put it in those household terms beloved of former prime minister Thatcher, been living more and more on tick.

Much-vaunted income tax cuts (indirect taxation has, of course, been rising) have been paid for by loading up debt and selling the family silver. That debt now hangs dreadfully heavy, as an item of current expenditure for interest payments and a commitment on our children to keep on paying. These figures are history. They shape and constrain the operations of government now. The mess British public finance is in ought to be a constant reference point during the election campaign to come, for both parties. It is a mess created and concealed by the Tories, yet it is an act of concealment to which Labour is assenting. Go back to 1979 and start adding up the income of the state. First there are the proceeds of taxation, value added tax as well as income tax - we must not be fooled by that Conservative fixation on direct individual tax, aided and abetted by its economically illiterate clique in the newspaper press. Then there were the milk floats and Sid and the resulting special supplements to government income from privatisation. Now subtract the £3,000bn of government spending since, noting (with surprise) how this has been a social policy government, in the sense that it has increased spending on health and education, but above all it has pumped billions into social security, much of that money to support increased numbers out of work.

Lo and behold, the result is a negative figure. Spending turns out to be bigger than the sum of revenues. All those homilies from Lady Thatcher, all those patronising lessons from Lord Lawson... To maintain spending it has borrowed and borrowed. The indebtedness of the British state has tripled since 1979. National debt has proudly kept up with the growth in national income over the period. How many times, during the 1980s, did smooty commentators and Tory Treasury ministers pooch-pooch suggestions that the tax revenues from the North Sea oil bonanza represented a special flow of income that should not be squandered in payments to the unemployed, their numbers swollen by the Government's own policy errors? As for privatisation, that great jewel in the crown of Conservative performance in the 1980s and 1990s, its proceeds have paid for - what? For unemployment and cuts in higher-level income tax. The Government defends its record by pointing out that general government debt at about 54 per cent of GDP is lower than in most other countries of the European Union, though only marginally less than in France. Government spending in Britain, as a proportion of national product, is also lower than in neighbouring countries. But that is not really the point: it is how we have chosen to pay for levels of public spending. We have been living on one-off inflows and increased borrowing. And the facts of life now are that there are no more

North Sea windfalls. There are no further large-scale privatisations. Borrowing cannot go on at its present level because of the burden of interest payments on debt. There is no need even to pray in aid the criteria set down in the Maastricht Treaty for convergence among the member states of the EU prior to decisions about a single currency: on present and projected levels of deficit between income and spending, Britain fails the test. These figures are not just damning for the Tories. They would be a vice for Gordon Brown, too, were he to become Chancellor. Its jaws are unforgiving: historic patterns of public expenditure cannot be afforded. Labour can look to no privatisation proceeds. Its European sympathies would make the Maastricht criteria even more compelling. The arithmetic allows only one conclusion - for Labour, even New Labour, cannot and will not engage in large-scale cuts in existing levels of public spending. Taxes will have to rise.

This is the modern political equivalent of the love that dare not speak its name, the latter-day version of Harold Wilson's decree of omertà over devaluation, the Blairite equivalent of the Wittgensteinian injunction - about that which we cannot speak, let us be silent. Tax increases are the great unmentionable, and the only way out of the public spending morass. Mr Brown and his colleagues purse their lips for a good reason. They stand to be pilloried in the press for even breathing the T-word. That claque which so applauded Thatcherite mismanagement and hailed Lord Lawson's income tax cuts - will round on any Chancellor who proposes to put the fiscal house in order.

But Mr Brown's silence can only last so long. If he became Chancellor he would have to act. His is an ugly dilemma: to go into the polls knowing what has to be done, but afraid to tell a home truth to a British public lulled by successive Treasury con artists. In such dire circumstances we might agree that discretion is the better part. But Mr Brown had better be preparing a convincing story to tell the public when the day comes and taxes have to be raised. He could do no better than start with the figures presented today, using them in the bitter re-education of the British public. The national treasure has been squandered by a Government purporting to be the pillar of rectitude. It sustained itself by a kind of bribery. The challenge facing Labour, in office, is the politics of fiscal honesty.

Marriage of convenience

After a marriage has ended, it is always a triumph of hope over experience when one partner decides to tie the knot again. There are always people carping on the sidelines, tutting and shaking their heads and saying it won't work. But second marriages are often more lasting and satisfactory than those contracted in the first flush of youth. As with Prince Charles, so with Nelson Mandela: both are considering whether to remarry after marriages that came apart spectacularly, and in public. We wish them both good luck. Perhaps they could consider a joint ceremony: it would certainly reduce the cost to both nations if they all invited the world's heads of states to one big bash, and pooled the cost of the sherry and champagne.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Licence fee is low-cost way to quality TV

Sir: I wonder if your reader who wrote so forcefully (Letters, 28 August) about abolishing the licence fee and introducing advertising on the BBC or pay-per-view TV is aware of these facts.

Everything we buy is more expensive because of the intrusive advertising on the commercial channels. In the case of Sky and TTV, the quality is inferior also. If the BBC took on advertising our television would sink to the level of programmes in the United States. Pay-per-view is expensive, as Sky has shown - its subscription sport works out at roughly £300 per annum. Perhaps your writer can afford this.

If the BBC lowered itself to intrusive and offensive advertising it would ruin programmes such as sport, which need unbroken coverage. ITV has already shown this with its "We'll be back after this short break". In fact even with the proposed licence increase, the cost of BBC TV and radio would be only about 27p per day.

NICHOLAS COX
Redhill, Surrey

Sir: Polly Toynbee (27 August) makes three errors in assuming that I advocate subscription funding replacing the licence fee simply in order to benefit Sky.

First, I have been arguing the subscription case for 14 years, long before I joined Sky. It is the most efficient, most honest and most flexible way of financing the BBC as a public service broadcaster, especially in the multi-channel age. Far from shedding "crocodile tears" over jailing licence evaders, I believe such actions to be unnecessary and deeply damaging to the BBC.

Second, it is not obvious why it is in Sky's interest for the BBC to act more commercially in pricing and selling its services. Indeed, a BBC freed from the constraints and odium of the licence fee might well provide the competitor to Sky for which your newspaper has so often called.

Third, Sky's chief executive has supported an immediate increase in the licence fee if the BBC was having trouble making ends meet on its £2bn a year income.

The spread of digital television will eventually make a compulsory licence fee anomalous. The BBC should embrace that prospect and prepare now for the post-licence fee future.

Child care needed at school age too

Sir: As the issue of child care for (would-be) working mothers again comes to prominence (Leading article, 29 August), the debate again fails even to touch on the problems of the majority of parents - those whose children are of school age.

Our experience was that finding a full-time nursery school place for our pre-school son was no problem as long as we could find £100 per week (almost the whole of my wife's salary initially, but a practical solution none the less).

What is virtually impossible is to find a school which offers pre-school and after-school arrangements that are compatible with both parents working full time, even where both employers are prepared to be very flexible. After much searching, the only schools we found which offered this provision were fee-paying: the experience of friends around the country confirms that this situation is widespread if not universal. An even greater problem is school holidays - in particular (for those able to use state schools) "Baker Days".

If we, as a professional two-parent family, find school-age child care a big practical and financial problem, then it is not surprising that most single parents view finding employment which will allow them to live from their own efforts rather than on state support as a practical impossibility.

DAVID WRIGHT
Southampton

Sir: The underlying assumption behind the latest child care initiative (Leading article, 29 August) is that mothers of pre-school children want to work, or work longer hours, and that to do this they want child care to be available and affordable.

Dr Catherine Hakim earlier this year suggested that many women made their families their priority, and that their approach was that work should be fitted around their families rather than the other way about.

Your coverage considers women and their supposed aspirations in some detail. Their children apparently are obstacles. We appreciate that many mothers work from economic necessity, and would like to see their circumstances improved so that a real choice becomes possible. We would like to see a strategy for child care which included some recognition of the needs of parents in the home. The tax system favours two-income families. As your editorial suggests, a "rigorous review" of the tax and benefit system would be of great help.

Stop sneering at Labour changes

Sir: Austin Mitchell may feel he is enjoying a harmless joke in the privacy of the columns of the New Statesman by sneering at the changes in the Labour Party ("Blair is a dictator, Labour MP says", 29 August). But those who desperately want rid of this squalid government won't be laughing.

The Labour Party has offered a number of key pledges to improve the health service, create employment and provide a minimum wage, which would enhance the quality of life for millions. Under Tony Blair's leadership, the likelihood of achieving such change is greater than at any time in the past two decades. I, like many others in front-line marginal constituencies, will be fighting hard to make that change a reality. Trying to operate under verbal sniper-fire from the likes of Austin Mitchell only makes that job more difficult. Quit the heckling Austin, and get stuck in.

Shipyard never said 'unsinkable'

Sir: In regard to Geoffrey Hodgson's article on the Titanic ("Graves, the new destination", 31 August), it is worth noting that the claim that the Titanic was unsinkable came not from Harland and Wolff in Belfast (the designer and builder) or the White Star Line (the owner), but from the press of the day. The ship was described as "practically unsinkable" in a newspaper article.

It was, however, well known in Harland that if a certain number of the bulkheads were breached, the ship would go down.

The lack of lifeboats was due to standard safety practice of the time, not because anyone thought the ship could not sink. The number of lifeboats reflected the number of first- and second-class passengers the ship could carry. Most who went down with the Titanic were steerage.

Energy threat of air-conditioning

Sir: Doubtless, David Porter (Letters, 27 August) would argue that he is merely seeking to be humorous when he makes his fervent plea to the members of the various Electricity Consumers' Committees to put air-conditioning into all their premises.

But it is precisely the increasing use of air-conditioning in offices which helps to make the sector the fastest-growing energy-using part of the economy - faster even than motor vehicles. Writing as he does on behalf of the Association of Electricity Producers, it is in Mr Porter's members' interests to encourage as much fuel to be burnt as possible.

Thereby hangs part of the dilemma all governments face when trying to address the threat of climate change by reducing energy consumption.

Since Donald Cameron Watt in his book review of Op/BJ, ("The spy who went after the gold", 31 August) claims that the book is a work of "unbelievable, unforgivable" fiction, when will he be presenting the "actual, factual evidence" to justify his receiving that reward?

How airships let me down

Sir: Christian Wolmar's article (28 August) about airships "comeback" brought back sad memories of my only foray into shareholding, with Airship Industries in the mid-Eighties.

I still have a file of cuttings and annual reports with the same sort of optimistic pronouncements being made by the Zeppelin company now. Airship Industries did run tourist flights over London, several Australian cities and San Francisco. In 1988 the shareholders were told they had a contract with the US Navy to supply airships for surveillance, and Korea bought one for the Olympics.

I thought my 1,500 shares - 1,000 of which were bought for me at 6p by an American friend who was a blimp fanatic, and the other 500 I bought myself later at 23p, having become infected with the blimp bug - were going to make me rich.

I then went abroad for a couple of years and returned in late 1991 to find that airships had disappeared from the scene. I don't think I'll be rushing to buy Zeppelin shares.

Breast-feeding is safer than bottle

Sir: Whilst applauding the idea of your newspaper's forthcoming "Guide to a Healthy Pregnancy", I was somewhat taken aback by the photograph featured in your advert showing a baby being bottle-fed (31 August). I can only assume that your guide will include a detailed discussion of and warnings about the dangers of bottle-feeding.

It is scientifically established that breast-feeding reduces the incidence of infectious diseases, allergies and Sudden Infant Death Syndrome. Advice from government health departments (and indeed the Health Education Authority, which I note supports your guide), is that breast milk should be the sole source of nutrition for the first four months of life.

Globe dilemma

Sir: I was pleased to see that John Walsh had undergone the Big "O" experience in Southwark ("What's this? Punch and Judy at the Globe?", 29 August). I shared much of the excitement he mentioned, propped up by my elbows at the right corner of the stage.

But the scene with Anastasia Hill, with her hands tied behind her back, being hauled towards my corner by the robbers, so that she was barely ten inches from my face, posed a real dilemma for me. As a gentleman of the second Elizabethan age I felt it my duty to assist her, at least by restoring her shoulder strap and white petticoat.

But as a coarse grounding of the first Elizabethan age I would have surely been more inclined to ogle her in her distress and let the villains have their way. In accordance with John Walsh's plea, I "learned my lines" and let the action take its lip-smacking course.

The trouble with conviction

Britain's cows get BSE. Hundreds of prisoners get premature release. Why do such great mistakes keep being made? Christopher Foster argues that changes initiated by Margaret Thatcher have undermined effective government

Is it a figment of the imagination, or are there more government misdeeds than there used to be? Why was the BSE crisis so badly handled, at vast expense to the taxpayer and to all those supplying beef? Why are there repeated difficulties in the relationships between the Home Secretary and the Prison Service? Why have the judges so often decided that Mr Howard has exceeded his powers? Even a matter as important as Drumcree is coloured by the suspicion that it was not well handled, and that the fault lay somewhere between ministers and the Northern Ireland police authorities.

One explanation that is often heard for these difficulties is that the Government has been too long in office and that, as a result, some ministers are simply too tired. If that is true, new ministers before or after an election might bring about a solution. Another is that declining government competence reflects Britain's decline in authority and world influence. With the passing of Empire, we have lost our long-standing ability to govern well. If it is true, there would seem to be no cure.

Both factors have had some effect, but less visible and more practical factors have gradually and cumulatively altered the operations of government profoundly. High among them has been the replacement of consensus by conviction politics since 1979.

Margaret Thatcher came to power with firmly held convictions, among them to replace Keynesian with monetarist economic policies and to weaken the power of the unions. Given a widespread belief that Britain was in crisis, she believed that she had a mandate to do whatever was necessary. Although they were not unreasonable at the time, changes that were made then have persisted long past the emergency that justified them, and have had unintended consequences which are responsible for many of the stresses and weaknesses of government today.

The first changes were to the Cabinet and Cabinet committees. Before 1979, the Cabinet decided government policy on the basis of papers put to it by the departmental ministers responsible. Normally, a policy had been discussed and approved previously in a Cabinet committee of those ministers with an interest in it. Moreover, because approval of the whole Cabinet had to be sought, a departmental minister would have been wise to try to persuade any other Cabinet minister who had a personal interest in the policy. While, with such precautions, most policies got through Cabinet after brief discussion, others did not: contentious policies could be altered or even abandoned as a result of open debate.

When Mrs Thatcher found she was facing strong opposition on many of her policies, not only from the parliamentary opposition but from within her own Cabinet, she changed the system. Cabinet papers on policy issues were no longer circulated before its meetings, which, in any case, were fewer and shorter. Those that were still held became mostly business meetings, at which ministers reported verbally on the progress they were, or were not, making. Real discussion was rare, and effective disagreement increasingly became impossible.

Even these profound, but generally unnoticed, changes did not, however, remove all the obstacles to conviction politics. Mrs Thatcher sometimes found her policies opposed by ministers with a right to attend particular Cabinet committees. So Cabinet committees were frequently bypassed and replaced by ad hoc meetings of ministers chosen as the ones most likely to get the outcome she wanted. While excellent for getting otherwise contentious policies through, this procedure had a drawback that became noticeable over time.

Government policy became less easily co-ordinated, which was not helped by the dismantling of most Civil Service Cabinet committees underpinning the ministerial ones. While Margaret Thatcher remained Prime Minister, her energy and relent-

Civil Service to some of the measures she proposed. Not unreasonably, this led to a greater readiness to override Civil Service advice, though she respected individual civil servants; but it gradually went much further than this, especially after 1992. Once the immediate needs of conviction politics were served, the change of attitude persisted. Although the old Thatcherite convictions, once on the statute-book, were not replaced by many as firmly held, ministers look more power to themselves. They turned more to political advisers, to lobbyists and to outside sympathisers.

Many White and Green Papers have been for media consumption rather than reasoned debate less eye for detail co-ordinated policy, but it was a highly personal achievement.

More serious was a decline in collective Cabinet responsibility, leading to some ministers' feeling less commitment to policies in which they had not had a part. Hence the development of fairly open disagreements, the most public of which was the argument between Michael Heseltine and Leon Brittan over Westland Helicopters. Such disagreements still lead to different ministers being quoted as backing different policies - recently, for example, on education and welfare payments, not to mention Europe. Moreover, policies and laws could sometimes have been improved by the contribution of those excluded ministers and their departments.

Margaret Thatcher also, rightly, believed that there would be opposition from among the

While the relationships often remain close, they are still different. The Civil Service in some departments used to work in partnership with ministers, privy to all the decisions taken by them - except for the most political, such as choosing the date of the next general election. Instead, civil servants have sometimes found themselves in the position of implementing policies and other decisions that ministers had worked out for themselves with their external advisers. Because of the new relationship they have with ministers, civil servants frequently find it harder to challenge what ministers put to them and to argue for what they feel are practical improvements or more realistic alternatives - nor are they able to spend enough time early on going through the evidence to avert a calamity such as BSE. Given ministerial preoccupation with the media, civil servants, too, have been drawn more into issues of presentation, rather than weighing evidence and analysing the consequences of possible courses of action. As ministers have frequently failed to work out their policies in enough detail to be easily capable of practical implementation, one consequence has been poorer-quality White Papers and Bills, with many amendments, often late, and frequently needing subsequent modification.

Legislation has also been affected by another consequence of conviction politics. Before 1979, the usual practice had been to seek consensus and practical help for proposed legislation by consulting widely with interested parties. Often the first stage would be a short White or Green Paper in which a minister would set out a problem he or she thought needed solving, followed by preferred (and possibly other) solutions with their various pros and cons. While rarely consulting widely enough, and generally giving more weight to producers than consumers, ministers and civil servants would set out to canvass the views of all concerned. Of course, ministers would not accept all views put to them, but wise ones tried to get as much consensus as was consistent with their fundamental beliefs. They tried particularly to confront the practical difficulties raised, so improving the quality and public acceptability of legislation.

Another advantage of a rigorous process of consultation was that ministers had to try to persuade those who disagreed with them, face to face, and answer objections raised. Conviction politics often seem to make such consultation unnecessary. While understandable, when the Government was sure of exactly what it wanted to do, it lasted into a time when there was no such sureness of purpose. Can one be surprised that some laws have not lasted, and have had to be replaced - that, for example, we have had so many Criminal Justice Acts? Or that so many White and Green Papers have been for media consumption rather than reasoned debate?

Another consequence of the decline of consultation has been its replacement by an American-style lobby system that scarcely existed before 1979. Working on ministers through MPs, rather than through civil servants, this has meant ministers have been subject to most pressure and influence from lobbies that have had the resources and political connections to be effective, rather than being guided by an old-style, perhaps limited, but more even-handed consultation process. A further consequence has been the growth of the complex relations between MPs and lobbyists that led to the Nolan Commission.

A particular problem in relations between ministers and the Civil Service has developed through the setting up of executive agencies. In some cases, their heads have reported directly at first to ministers, unsupported by Civil Service advice. That was generally found to be undesirable. Various models have been tried since, but it is not clear how successful they have been. The recent events in the Prison Service show how difficult it is to get ministers, their civil servants and their agencies working well together with a clear division of responsibilities. Moreover, at the start, insufficient thought was given to how to make these agencies accountable to ministers and Parliament, especially when, as with the Prison Service, their business is of great public and political interest. One interim arrangement after another has been attempted, but to judge by recent events, none has succeeded. While executive agencies dealing with more routine matters have usually done well, the right place for the Prison Service may well be back in the Home Office under traditional Civil Service supervision, firmly within the Whitehall system.

Nor are these the only significant changes. If there were to be a change of government, those very few in it who remember government as it once was will find much else changed. Individual ministers vary greatly in their work habits, but if new ministers follow the current norm, they will spend more time meeting lobby-inspired deputations, making speeches to all kinds of bodies, and on relations with the media generally. This will mean less time in their departments occupied in the traditional ministerial tasks of reviewing evidence before taking decisions, scrutinising drafts of White Papers and Bills, and consulting with others in a systematic way. They will find a Civil Service that is unaccustomed to giving them the assistance that they once received in order to find their ideas and make them practical, but one that is willing to return to past practice. While some ministers remain able to work well in such circumstances, elsewhere the stresses and strains show.

Many of these changes, which have taken place in the past 17 years, should not be reversed. Most executive agencies - as is also the case for internal markets, privatisation and independent regulation - are here to stay. But the Cabinet system, the co-ordinating machinery below it, and working relations between ministers can - and should be - brought back to what they once were.

Sir Christopher Foster's book 'The State under Stress' (Open University Press, £16.99) written with FJ Plowden, is published today. In it, the authors suggest various remedies for the problems raised above.

Now the festival's over, the wild times begin

A night or two ago I was parking a car at 2am in Melville Street, which is a large Georgian street in Edinburgh's West End, and as I got out of the car I realised I was not alone. Standing in the middle of the otherwise empty wide street, not 200 yards from Princes Street, was a large fox. He looked at me. I looked at him. He realised that I did not look either particularly dangerous or good to eat, and went on investigating the flying bags of rubbish before disappearing into a basement area.

It was a sign, I think, a sign that the festival was coming to a close, and that the residents of Edinburgh were reclaiming their city. Maybe the fox had been out of Edinburgh during the festival, and had let his fox-hole to some tourist foxes at an exorbitant rate. But now it was time to come back. The end of the festival is like the end of summer and the start of autumn - all the signs are there, as the Fringe posters turn brown and flutter to the ground, and the critics and performers prepare to flock south for the winter.

The football season is already so advanced in Scotland that every professional footballer in the country has already been interviewed at least once by the papers - although none of them has said anything of interest except Gilles Rousset, Hearts' French goalkeeper, who intriguingly confessed that he never went to French restaurants in Edinburgh, only to Italian ones, thus further confirming my wife's feeling that Italian cooking is ousting French cuisine in quality and appeal.

Anyway, I am going to try to avoid football this season and find a new, alternative amusement. And if I do, I don't think it will be stand-up comedy. Exposure to the Edinburgh Fringe has more or less cured me of that. The accepted wisdom is that stand-up comedy is beginning to recede, but I am not sure that this is true. The reason there is so much stand-up comedy on the Fringe is not just that people like it but that it is cheap to put on, at least compared with revue or drama. One man, one mike, no set, one script and there you are.

What is encouraging is that this year there were shows emerging that were neither stand-up, nor sketch comedy, nor even drama, but somewhere in the middle. The two best shows I saw in Edinburgh this year (Let the Donkey Go and Fantastic Voyage) were both terrifically funny but they were both terrific pieces of theatre, which is something that stand-up comedy never is.

Let the Donkey Go was a wonderful three-man show, threaded (like a Marx Brothers film) on a loony spy story but whose funniest moments - a biscuit endurance act, a national anthem episode, a torture scene - were barely relevant to the plot.

Fantastic Voyage was reviewed by everyone as if it were a homage to old-fashioned film special effects, but this two-man show by Gavin Robertson and Andy Taylor was an extraordinary display of mime and comic skills which made the audience work hard and was twice as good for it.

Anyway, now Edinburgh is back to normal, with merely horrendous traffic and parking problems, instead of impossible ones, and no sign of the festival left behind. Or is there?

There was a time when people still did spontaneous things on the Fringe, and the comedian Arthur Smith used to do conducted historical tours of Edinburgh starting at 2am. I came across him once in the wee small hours pointing through the windows of some big building and telling his encourage that this was Holyrood Palace, where Mary Queen of Scots lived with her paramour, Kenny Dalgligh. Uproarious laughter. Well, it was 2am.

But one year he ended up challenging his followers to see how many of them could get on top of a bus shelter. I don't know how many made it, but I do know that the shelter collapsed.

I also know that this year Edinburgh bus shelters bore a notice saying: "Beware - the top of this bus shelter has been treated with anti-climb paint!"

Remember that, the next time someone tells you the Fringe has no lasting effect on Edinburgh.

When she needed Shelter, you were there

Britain's first single-issue pressure group found Cathy a home in the Sixties, but the fire may be going out now

The founding 30 years ago of the first modern charity, Shelter, will be celebrated this week. Of campaigning charities as we have come to know them, Shelter is the original model. In 1966, then extensive slums, a number of church campaigns and chose a brilliant New Zealand. Des Wilson, to devise it and carry it out. Shelter still calls itself The National Campaign For Homeless People. Looking back, it can be seen that this was one of the most important creations of the innovative Sixties. It led to the development of single-issue pressure groups, which have become a fifth estate, alongside the press (the fourth estate) as a counterweight to the power of government.

Des Wilson was 25 years old when he wrote a report for the church housing trusts urging that the campaign should aim to convince people that the housing situation "was out of control", that Shelter would be a "rescue operation" in a national emergency and that the homeless were innocent victims. The campaign thus had resonance; it also had focus. The aim was to raise funds for housing trusts operating in four black spots - Glasgow, Liverpool, Birmingham and London. It had an evocative name, Shelter. And a few days before its launch it had a great piece of luck: Jeremy Sandford's powerful documentary-drama about a homeless family, Cathy Come Home, was shown on television. As a result, the opening campaign - in which a charity for the first time used national newspaper advertising, generated editorial coverage by lobbying editors and journalists, and directly mailed bodies likely to be supportive - was an astounding success.

ANDREAS WHITTAM SMITH

technique that the political parties are getting ready to use flat out, for the first time, in the forthcoming general election. The housing problems of the mid-Nineties are no less acute than they were in the mid-Sixties, but their character has changed. No longer is street after street of housing officially described as unfit for human habitation, still in use. The physical condition of housing at every level has greatly improved. Moreover, local authorities have stopped splitting up homeless families; in the Sixties the Poor Law attitudes of the 19th century still lingered on. But living conditions on housing estates today are grim in different ways. There are better amenities inside the home, but less personal security outside it. In the Sixties there were scarcely any youngsters sleeping rough; now there are more than 200,000 young men and women without a proper home and instead squatting, using emergency hostels or constantly moving from friend to friend. Institutions that once provided a refuge for vulnerable people have been closed down. The so-called policy of "Care in the Community" has put many people on to the street. At the same time, repossessions of property whose owners can no longer service their mortgages are running at a steady 50,000 a year. Shelter, too, has changed. It no longer needs to raise money for housing trusts. That gap was filled by the Government 20 years ago. It has replaced this activity with the provision of information, advice and advocacy through a national network of 48 housing aid centres. Shelter tells homeless people about their rights and options. It provides a telephone service that can quickly organise a bed for someone in a hostel for the night, it advises on mortgage repayment packages to prevent repossession, it represents people in the county court. At the same time, charities such as Shelter have become much more professional in terms of research, policy formulation and fundraising. Thirty years ago there was no career to be had working for them. Now they have proper management structures and take on committed young people in great number each year. What matters greatly, though, is that Shelter maintains its sense of indignation. The expression of righteous anger in a good cause, however, is put at risk by Shelter's reliance on the state for a fifth or so of its income. Like many charities it has contracts with government departments for the provision of certain services. These deals may seem harmless enough but they enlist charities into the Government's way of thinking, and they give the Government leverage which it could use one day. The jealous British state never accepts rival power centres and, unrestrained by a written Constitution, will always move against them in due course. Pressure groups take up unpopular causes that the political parties leave well alone. They act where governments will not. This is often convenient. But when it isn't, charities will do well to remember realpolitik. "No more cosy contracts with this or that ministry if you step out of line", will be the chill message from Whitehall.

Splits and splices: the real figures on divorce

William Hartston quotes the odds on staying hitched

Divorce, for reasons that momentarily elude me, was very much in the news last week, often accompanied by the pseudo-statistic that "one in three marriages ends in divorce". But what, if anything, does this mean?

In England and Wales in 1992 (the last year for which we have complete figures) there were 311,364 marriages and 160,345 divorces. That might appear to suggest a failure rate greater than one in two; but the marriages of 1992 can hardly be compared with the divorces of the same year. Indeed, 30,290 of those divorces were after marriages lasting more than 20 years, so should by rights be compared with the marriage figures in the 1970s or earlier. To make any valid statement, we should have to wait until all marriages contracted in a particular year have come to their natural or legal ends. By which time the figures would be too far out of date to be any use. We can, however, make a good estimate of what's going on these days by taking the past 10 years' figures.

In 1982, there were 342,166 marriages in England and Wales. Since then, each year has seen a termination of about 37,000 marriages of up to four years' duration, and 42,000 lasting between five and nine years. Each year from 1983 to 1987, we would expect about a fifth of the 37,000 divorces to have come from 1982 marriages. And each year from 1988 to 1992, we would expect about a fifth of our 42,000 figure to have come from 1982 marriages. So by 1992, roughly 79,000 of the 1982 marriages were over.

Now, the figures for recent years show a consistent trend for divorces within the first 10 years of marriage to comprise roughly half the total divorce rate. So if 79,000 of our 1982 marriages had ended in divorce by 1992, we could expect another 79,000 to reach the same sad conclusion in due course. Which adds up to 158,000 of the 342,166 we started with.

Things are clearly worse than we thought. It's not one in three marriages that end in divorce; it's closer to one in two. And that may help to explain why fewer people are getting married. In 1982, of every 1,000 people in the population, 13.8 got married. The figure peaked at 14.0 in 1987, but had dropped to 12.2 by 1992. Meanwhile, the divorce rate per 1,000 married couples grew from 12.0 in 1982 to an all-time high of 13.6 in 1992.

Between 1970 and 1991, the number of divorces in the UK as a whole had more than doubled. The only consolation appears to be that we are still outside the top 10 in the world divorce league. The Maldives, Liechtenstein and Peru take the medals for divorces, with the US in fourth place. However, if you really want to know the chances of a 1996 British marriage ending in divorce, you'll have to ask again in the year 2050.

Where do all the New Men go?

Polly Toynbee replies to Jack O'Sullivan's claims that his generation are gentle, thoughtful, considerate, in touch with their emotions, determined to be good fathers, and even taking therapy so that they become less hopelessly dependent on women

Dear Jack,

Your article on Friday was touchingly optimistic. You stake a fine claim to being a New Man, a man behaving well. But if you claim to speak for most of the men of your 35-year-old generation - I cast a wearily jaundiced old eye. I deeply doubt it.

There are lots of New Men, and indeed New Women, at your stage of life. I have seen them come - and go. Well, let's see what happens 10 years from now when you have two or three children. It's easy being New without kids.

Yes, the old gender stereotypes are fading fast. Mercifully, we are less constricted by antiquated ideas of what it is to be male or female. Boys do cry. Girls sometimes hit them. You claim emotionally autistic men are awaking from their long sensory deprivation. They no longer need women as their emotional crutches or their voices, though they may still like them very much. New Men have real bonding friendships. Very nice.

You stand on the brink of fatherhood and I understand why you rebel at the traditional role. It lacks glamour. Most of literature and autobiography casts the father as a distant figure, aloof, remote, disapproving and incapable of reaching out to his family. Traditional images of fatherhood are exceedingly unpleasant - from God the Father downwards. They imply authority, discipline and self-importance. The new climate of moral panic tells us that the modern world is falling apart without fathers in the home to keep everyone in line: "Wait till your father gets home!"

Motherhood, on the other hand, has everything good, including apple pie. Warmth, generosity, care, love, cooking, kindness, sticking plasters, emollient - it's got it all. What is there left over for fathers, except the bits no one wants? Now women may complain about nappies, vomit and lavatory-cleaning - but few women would swap roles.

Most mothers say they want equality. They want careers, they want to use their intelligence in the wider world. But they spent their time. (I would imagine that where both partners work, men are far more likely to try to do their share in the home.) These men do 12.69 hours a week of household work, compared with women's 25.33 hours, plus another seven hours extra of other essential duties. Social Trends tells the same story. The pace of change is slow. A survey of all families by City University shows that only 1 per cent of men undertake household chores on a permanent basis. Women still do most of the child care. Maybe those New Men whose fathers were out on the golf course are instead in therapy or out bonding in the woods with Tom John?

'The evidence is that fathers have very little measurable effect on families' then, most will admit that the thought of their children turning first to fathers for comfort frightens them. They want men to do their share, but deep down they do not want to lose their Queen Bee role. They want it all (but rarely get it). So it is hardly surprising that young men like you, surveying the future of your new family, should want a slice of mother's apple pie.

However, at present, the idea of men usurping women's domestic hegemony is comic. Let's get real. Take the Henley Centre's "Time Use Survey". They took full-time working men and full-time working women and compared the way

So, domestically, what are men for? As you rightly point out, women are increasingly wondering about this themselves, answering "Nothing" and ejecting the drones from their homes. Does she need a man around unless he contributes significantly to the easy running of the household, the upbringing of children or to her own happiness? Men have to earn their role as fathers these days. They have to prove their worth in families and where they fail to do so, things may fall apart.

The growing academic literature on fatherhood increasingly questions whether fatherhood exists as a real role at all.

Children need good parents - but not specifically men. Charlie Lewis, of Lancaster University, has been reviewing over a hundred of the latest fatherhood studies on both sides of the Atlantic. He says: "The overwhelming evidence now is that fathers have very little measurable effect on families. US families without fathers, once poverty is taken into account, show no developmental differences. There is no magical effect on children's cognitive development nor on their identification with sex roles." There is, he says, evidence that children need more than one stable loving adult figure in their lives, but who that is, or of what sex, makes no difference. (So, farewell, Freud.)

What women with children do need is a meal-ticket. In the old days that's what fathers were for - and it still is. For all the male angst about the growth of jobs for women, the overwhelming majority of mothers still cannot support themselves and their families. They may add to family income with part-time jobs, but men are still the breadwinners. (Only some 13 per cent of households have women earning more than their husbands.) Despite the Having-It-All triumphalism of up-market women's magazines, surprisingly few women manage well-paid, full-time work and children. One study of middle managers found that most of the men had children, but only 16 per cent of the women. Women still have to choose.

Now, young and newly married, maybe you, Jack, and your partner think you will both advance equally in your careers - but the odds are strongly stacked against. Fast-track jobs are almost impossible to combine with caring for families, for men or women. You are quite right to point out how attitudes in your generation are changing. But an attitude washes few dishes. Gender chic does change with the times - but the old, hard economic facts remain. I shall believe in New Men

THE CENTRAL FACTS FROM THE COURSES YOU ALWAYS MEANT TO TAKE, IN 25 LECTURES

What do you know? More to the point, how do you know what you know?

Bertrand Russell famously asked in The Problems of Philosophy: "Is there any knowledge in the world so certain that no one can doubt it?"

Descartes thought he'd got the answer when he deduced from the fact that he was doubting that he must therefore be thinking, and that if he was thinking then he must exist. And so, Cogito ergo sum - I think, therefore I am - the words that cast Western philosophy into a mode from which it did not recover for more than 300 years.

The Cogito sounds plausible, but it smells fishy. Wittgenstein thought that it started in the wrong place. After all, if, like Descartes, I am thinking about my capacity for systematic doubt, then this thinking must be going on in a language; and the notion of a private language doesn't make any sense. This argument pulls the rug from under the concept of Cartesian Prius and shows that subjective things are not the most certain.

Besides, asked Wittgenstein, must I be thinking about my existence in order to demonstrate to myself my existence - or will any old thought do as well? It sounds odd to say, "I think it's raining, therefore I exist." It is surely bizarre to deduce one's existence from one's thoughts - as if I should deduce that I am thirsty because I find myself drinking a pint.

Every answer imaginable has been offered to the question of how we know what we know.

Is knowledge the result of sense impressions? But what of when our senses deceive us? It is possible that we are dreaming. You may be dreaming that you are reading this article right now. The whole world might be a dream. Everything could be different from the way we see it. What if all the world were only an illusion?

But hang on a minute. If everything is an illusion, where do we get the idea of "illusion"? To claim that everything is illusory is like saying that all money is counterfeit.

The concept of what is illusory requires for its meaning the concept that some things are genuine. So far, so good. But which bits of what we perceive are real and which are not still anybody's guess - isn't it?

Surely we know the truths of arithmetic? But these have been held to be trivial - which is not much comfort to the youngster struggling with his times tables. They are trivial in the sense that what goes on the right side of the "=" sign is only an alternative way of describing what goes on the left side.

Thus, arithmetic is only, as philosophers say in their jargon, "analytic" - true by means of the meaning of arithmetical expressions, themselves. So we cannot get new knowledge from our use of words and symbols. To say that a bachelor is an unmarried man is only to put what we know already into different words.

There is another interesting thing about the problem of epistemology. It is hung about with a sort of buggery factor, and this is because of the nature of language itself. If you say something - anything - the form of language makes it immediately possible that you can be contradicted.

Language is binary. That is to say, as soon as you declare: "It is!", you invite the response: "No, it isn't!" This helps to explain why it is that for every idealist, there is a materialist; for every naturalist, an intuitionist; and so on down all the gloomy corridors of binary bind. (But see Hegel, who makes a virtue out of this.)

It is like the Moby Pylon "room for an argument" sketch, where someone says:

"Argument isn't just the automatic gainsaying of what the other person has said."

"Yes it is!"

"No it isn't!"

You can mug up on these interesting possibilities by reading Chomsky on the binary nature of language, and the educational psychologists' notion that everyone is born with "a primitive sense of the number two".

There are fascinating teleological speculations on this point. That our epistemology is bedevilled by the binary nature of our speech is only what we should expect for one of the ancient titles of the devil is "Binarus", and if you look at the opening of the Book of Genesis you will see that God called everything that he had made "good" except for what he made on the second day. If the truth may be defined as p, then certainly the lie is not-p, the alternative. And another of the devil's titles is Father of Lies.

These sorts of serendipitous discoveries are grist to the mill of those cultural anthropologists who say that all our philosophising is only an explicit and over-literal way of talking about what was known to our ancient and primitive forebears intuitively - or should that be naturally?

Dame Catherine Hall

Dame Catherine Hall worked all her life to raise the professional profile of nursing and to establish its central role in health care.

She was the General Secretary of the Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom from 1957 until 1982 – the third General Secretary since its founding in 1916.

Hall recognised the importance of raising the professional status of nursing to improve standards of care. She believed that establishing nursing as a powerful professional group depended on securing a new system of nursing education. In 1964, the RCN reported to the Plati Committee on Education that nurses in training should have student status, and that schools of nursing should be separate from hospitals. Student status for nursing was not achieved until after Catherine Hall had retired, but she laid the foundations of nursing education for the next 30 years.

In 1960, she supported the campaign that lifted the constitutional ban on male nurses joining the RCN. She believed strongly that the RCN should be representative, and in 1969 succeeded in extending the membership to enrolled nurses, and in 1970 to student nurses.

In 1964, she publicly criticised a salary award to nurses of only 2.5 per cent while stressing that they would never take strike action. Sympathetic workers sent in money to the nurses, while others went on strike in support. The Minister of Health at the time, Enoch Powell, was critical, complaining of nurses' "methods of controversy which have caused widespread embarrassment". Hall replied: "the nurses have in fact conducted themselves with great dignity and restraint. In my opinion, as usual the minister has not expressed himself very happily".

Another Secretary of State had a similar encounter. Barbara Castle once told me that she thought Hall was a formidable woman, who towered above her. During a dispute, commenting on Castle's proposal, Hall told her: "Secretary of State, if you do that, I can guarantee that you will not have a single nurse left in the NHS".

In 1977, the RCN registered as a trade union, a development Hall believed was "essential", and in the 1980s it grew faster than any other union. It is now the largest outside the TUC.

Throughout her career, Hall combined a dignified and professional approach to her work with kindness and compassion. When she was a ward sister and assistant matron, she always took responsibility for the nurses she managed, as well as finding time to support and care for patients.

Her colleague and friend Dame Kathleen Raven, a past RCN president and Chief Nursing Officer, said of her: "I don't think people realise how tender-hearted she was. She was always kind and very caring, but always dignified. She was delightful".

Catherine Hall was born in Sheffield in 1922, but moved to Rotherham as a child where her father was Chief Constable. She began her nursing career at Leeds General Infirmary, where she held positions as ward sister, Night Superintendent and Assistant Matron.

She travelled widely in Canada and the United States in 1950-51 on a travelling fellowship, the first ever awarded by the Governors at Leeds Infirmary, and studied methods of teaching and administration in different hospitals. In 1954, after studying at the Royal College of Nursing for a year, she became Assistant Matron at the Middlesex Hospital, London, before becoming RCN General Secretary in 1957.

Her considerable standing in health care meant that she was appointed to numerous committees, councils and boards. In 1980, she was appointed the first chair of the UK

Central Council for Nursing Midwifery and Health Visiting, nursing's statutory body. She also served on the General Medical Council (1979-89), and as a member of the Commission on Industrial Relations (1971-74).

Internationally, she represented the United Kingdom on the International Council of Nurses, as well as sitting on the expert panel of the World Health Organisation. In 1967, she was appointed CBE in the New Year's Honours, which coincided with the end of the RCN's Golden Jubilee year, and in 1982, just before her retirement as General Secretary, she was appointed DBE.

During her retirement, Hall chaired a committee in her home diocese of Plymouth which reviewed the social care provided by the diocese. She went on to chair the Plymouth Diocesan Committee for Social Care, which is responsible for increasing awareness in the South West about the growing need for social care, particularly since the Government's community care legislation.

John Christopherson

John Christopherson was a painter of small dreamlike townscapes that combine an almost naive intensity with great sophistication. He was also a knowledgeable, modest collector and connoisseur of antiquities, tribal objects and post-war art.

Born in Blackheath, London in 1921, Christopherson began his working life at Shell-Mex House in 1938, when Jack Beddington, the director of the publicity department, was pioneering the use of modern art in advertising. After a long wartime illness Christopherson worked at County Hall in London, choosing for his office wall a print of Paul Nash's Wood on the Downs; Nash's primeval landscapes and magical moons were later to have a lasting influence on Christopherson's own paintings.

In 1950, while working as a civil servant at the Geological Museum in South Kensington, he became interested in the French Art Brut movement and corresponded with Jean Dubuffet, who offered encouragement when Christopherson himself began to paint.

John Christopherson felt that his life in art did not really begin until 1950 when he met Jacob Epstein and started to visit West End galleries – he said that it was a revelation that "such a magical world co-existed on the same level and at the same time as the boring, prosaic one of rationing, coupons and the civil service", and he determined to enter it. His annus mirabilis was 1951, the year of the Festival of Britain. This was when his tastes and interests were moulded and when he found his vocation. In 1959 he resigned from the civil service and became a full-time painter.

Christopherson was once described as a petit maître, a modest accolade that pleased him, although he always craved greater recognition. He once wrote to me describing his fantasy self, "a poet and dreamer who in some miraculous way managed to claw his way to the summit of the art world". This was only half in jest: he often wrote of his frustration at what he perceived as his lack of recognition – he wanted to join his heroes in the artistic pantheon of 1950s greats. His 1975 painting Wall and Graffiti is a homage to his heroes, with the names of painters, jazz musicians, photographers and writers poignantly inscribed into the heavily worked and textured surface.

From boyhood he was fascinated by the idea of antiquity. He was always interested in ancient stones, pavements, mosaics, archaeological sites, walls and buildings which had gradually changed and been eroded by time. Walls with faded posters and graffiti particularly attracted him – he treasured and identified himself with what he described as the "forlorn poetry of the unregarded".

Christopherson's pictures linger in the memory. His image world is a distillation of cultural debris sifted with poetic intensity. His pictures are a microcosm of his tastes and obsessions. Each small painting is haunted by a sense of deja vu, the ordinary becomes extraordinary. The subtle depths of layers of glazes are incised with the mysterious markings of a private language.

Terence Mullaly once described how his works "convey the impression of a world frozen in a dream". George Melly, writing about pictures he purchased for the Arts Council Collection in 1979, wrote that Christopherson's "point of departure is some discreet corner of the urban townscape. He imposes a melancholy geometry, transforming it into a city deserted by its inhabitants who have left behind them, their only monument, some reticent graffiti. His colour is as private as his imagery. His pictures whisper. They are worth listening to."

In 1958 Christopherson married his wife Anne, also a painter. After living in Blackheath until 1962, they moved to Hampstead Village, then returned to his native Blackheath in 1967. Both locations provided the subjects for many of his mature paintings. In Blackheath they lived in an architect-designed modern house which they filled with 1950s furniture and their collection of African masks and post-war paintings and sculpture.

In his home, as in his paintings, Christopherson created a private world, a collage of his time and tastes. It was his refuge, the place where he would paint and listen to jazz or the music of Debussy and Ravel. He would communicate with fellow jazz buffs via the radio programme Jazz Record Requests, and one of his imaginary alter egos was an authentically existentialist "jazz fiend". He read widely, fuelling his imagination from such diverse writers as Aldous Huxley, Virginia Woolf, Evelyn Waugh, the Sitwells, Cecil Beaton, James Agate and Denton Welch.

Christopherson hated to use the telephone and was an avid letter writer, corresponding with an eclectic circle of people who shared his various interests in art and music. His letters were characterised by their complex mixture of poetic charm, boyish jokes, nuggets of information and gleeful gossip combined with an almost uncontrolled venting of spleen at whatever was the current focus of what he called his "anxiety neurosis".

He was of Cornish ancestry and regularly visited St Ives, home to many of the British artists of the 1950s that he admired. However, his main influences were really from the Continent: artists such as Tappies, Brancusi, Giacometti, Fautrier, Burri, de Staël, Pollock, Richter, Wols, Balbus and Veiera da Silva. In England he particularly admired the works of Ben Nicholson, Eduardo Paoletti, William Scott and his old friend Alan Reynolds. He once said: "I like a painting that stands on a wall, or a sculpture that stands on a stand... nothing much that has happened since the 1950s really interests me." The post-war years are usually thought of as a time of austerity, but Christopherson found that "the bleak world of Giacometti and William Scott was good enough for me".

He haunted the London salerooms, and often could be found sitting through Modern British art sales at Sotheby's, carefully noting down results. He collected and collated information as well as paintings and objects and delighted in passing on his carefully garnered, sometimes arcane knowledge. On Saturdays he liked to visit the Portobello Road market, and until his health failed, would usually finish his day in Notting Hill Gate with a visit to England & Co, shyly producing his latest antiquity from his equally ancient shopping bag. It was usually a piece of the Chinese jade he had collected for many years; he loved those early ritual objects that reminded him of simple abstract sculptures.

Always an obsessive man, his last years were blighted by the increasing severity of his depressive illness. By 1994 his visits to central London had ceased and he had stopped painting.

Christopherson exhibited his work from 1961, showing often at the Leicester Galleries, the Marjorie Parr Gallery and Agnews. In 1989 he showed his predominantly abstract paintings and collages from the 1960s at England & Co, where he continued to exhibit regularly. His last exhibition was a retrospective in December 1995 at the Woodlands Art Gallery in Blackheath. In 1997 there will be a memorial exhibition at England & Co.

Jimmy Gordon

Without becoming one of football's household names – indeed, he was unknown professionally outside the confines of the game – Jimmy Gordon exercised a profound influence on one of the most remarkable sporting success stories of modern times.

A wise, unfussy, endlessly enthusiastic Scot, he spent the last six years of his long career in soccer as chief coach to Nottingham Forest, playing an unsung but crucial part in the hitherto unfashionable 'Trent-siders' rise from the ranks of Second Division strugglers to twice-crowned champions of Europe.

Throughout this glorious interlude, between January 1975 and his retirement in May 1981, Gordon's shrewd instruction and skilful preparation of high-quality athletes was admirable, yet arguably it did not represent the most onerous aspect of his duties. No, what made the coach's contribution so special was the way he coped with the club's hugely talented but undeniably eccentric management team of Brian Clough and the late Peter Taylor.

A man of unimpeachable integrity and ever approachable, Gordon was an expert in rebuilding the confidence of young men whose egos had taken a battering from the acerbic Clough. Though hard in his own way, expecting total dedication and ceaseless effort from his charges, Gordon became a much-respected "father-confessor" and go-between, without whom Forest would have been immeasurably the poorer.

When the manager and his equally mercurial lieutenant were away from the City Ground, Gordon was left to supervise the day-to-day running of football matters, a task he accomplished with calm efficiency. In 1980 Clough rewarded his loyal retainer by arranging for him to lead Forest out at Wembley before the League Cup Final against Wolves. Sadly, they lost that day, but by then the popular coach was well acquainted with the taste of triumph.

Having spent the first five years of his working life as a miner in West Lothian, Gordon was familiar with a less glamorous side of life, too, a grounding which served him well during a worthy playing career as an old-fashioned wing-half with Second Division Newcastle United, whom he joined in 1935, and then First Division Middlesbrough after the war.

Though the conflict – during which he served in the Army – had robbed him of what should have been his prime years, he excelled at Ayresome Park, where he became a tenacious ball-winner whose main job was to supply possession to the star England inside-forward Wilf Mannion.

Gordon did not quite attain international class himself, but he earned the approbation of his peers, notably the great Bill Shankly, who once said of him: "If you had to play against Jimmy every week you would never sleep at night."

He played until he was 38, being so fit that later he regretted not continuing until he was at least 40, before learning his trade as a trainer with Middlesbrough and going on to become chief coach of Blackburn Rovers in the mid 1960s.

However, the most fateful moment in Gordon's professional life still lay ahead. It came in 1969 in the form of a call from Brian Clough, whom he had known as a talented but highly precocious and argumentative footballer at Middlesbrough. Clough was offering the chance to coach Derby County, newly promoted to the top flight, and after some persuasion Gordon accepted.

Thereafter he was an essential part of the Clough bandwagon, contributing to Derby's League title in 1972, accompanying the famous extrovert during his ill-fated 44-day sojourn as the boss of Leeds United in 1973 and then, after a brief spell as a foreman with Rolls-Royce, he joined Clough at Forest. There followed promotion to the First Division in 1977, League title and League Cup triumphs in 1978, European Cup final glory against Malmö in 1979 and Hamburg in 1980, as well as another League Cup win in 1979.

Clough – with whom there were to be sad differences over the Scot's contribution to a book on his controversial former manager following his retirement – described his trusty aide as "dignified, dedicated and charming", and there is no shortage of people in football who would echo those sentiments.

Gordon, whose wife Olive died in 1994, lived in Derby. He had been suffering from Alzheimer's disease, the bane of so many former footballers, for two years.

The Rev Eric Heaton

The Rev Eric Heaton was the agent of the completion of all the windows left unglazed with decorative glass in the great hall of Christ Church, writes Patrick Reynolds [further to the obituary by Hugh Rice, 29 August]. What had begun to be glazed by Bodley was left unfinished at the beginning of the 1914 war, and by the end of the Second World War it was half-bombarded and patched up to an embarrassing extent.

Heaton decided to rectify the situation, but it was not easy either to determine what to do or to get the college and its students to support any scheme with unanimity. Heaton's tact and sensitivity overcame the problems of style and of managing a corpus of highly individual academic personalities. Eventually the style adopted was that of 1588, had the breach with Rome never occurred. (I had in mind glass that would have gone with that of Peterhouse, Cambridge, an amalgam of high gothic and baroque.) This was a triumph success, and was completed in 1984, when a celebratory dinner of gargantuan proportions was held.

From a letter to me I know that Heaton looked on the completion of the great hall glazing as one of the great highlights of his tenure. Certainly the work of 11 full windows, would have been immeasurably more difficult to do but for the constant mental and spiritual support from Eric Heaton.

Britten: safe blood programmes

Dr Anthony Britten was the head of the blood programme of the League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies from 1985 to 1989 and Vice-Chairman of the World Federation of Haemophilia. He worked ceaselessly to promote medical services for people with haemophilia, especially in developing countries where safe blood programmes did not exist. He was uniquely able to understand the medical, emotional and social needs of this population as he was born in South Africa with severe haemophilia A, at a time when almost all boys born with bleeding disorders died before they reached maturity. (Two of his uncles died in childhood.) Apart from some happy years spent at a sympathetic prep school, The Ridge, he was educated by family and tutors, for no senior school would accept the risk that such a life-threatening condition posed.

Despite the loneliness of his adolescent years, he honed his exceptional intellectual gifts and by the age of 15 knew he wanted to be a doctor. He was accepted to read Medicine at the University of Witwatersrand and, despite periods of illness and pain, completed his medical training and extended his experience in various London hospitals in the early 1960s. But it was in Boston, Massachusetts that he found the opportunity to develop his interest in haematology. The years from 1965 to 1975 were characterised by great intellectual endeavour in his chosen field, and he published many papers on cell culture and haemostasis.

However it was his personal experience of the pain and suffering associated with haemophilia that kept his focus on caring above all for his patients at the New England Medical Centre Hospitals and Harvard Medical School.

In the 1970s he moved to New York State to head the American Red Cross Blood Services, NE Region, in Albany, where he remained until he went to Geneva in 1985. There he worked with ceaseless energy to promote the establishment of safe and comprehensive blood transfusion services and treatment for people with coagulation disorders throughout the world. He and his colleagues published WHO guidelines on the organisation of safe blood transfusion service and promoted the principle of non-remuneration for blood collection and procedures to prevent the spread of AIDS, hepatitis and other viruses.

His own life was tragically affected by the wave of contaminated Factor VIII which devastated the haemophilic population in the early 1980s, and he and his wife, Sue Jago, contracted HIV before tests to detect its presence in blood products were available. Jago died in 1993; two years later he married a childhood friend, Hilary Picardie, who cared for him during his final years, which were characterised by courage, serenity in the face of death, and a sense of humour. Now living in Wales, they were able to indulge his other great passions, for music and cricket, going to concerts and supporting Glamorgan County cricket team.

Footsie tipped to shrug off Wall Street jitters and break new ground

Five Footsie companies report this week, heralding the end of the stock market's more leisurely summer season.

Mind you, for shares it has not been the poor holiday time many expected. Although exuberance faded towards the end of last week Footsie powered to a peak and the second-line index managed a remarkable 20-day winning streak.

Trading volumes, as befits the period when many players are away from their screens, were often woefully thin. But there is no doubt the market suddenly acquired a touch of confidence, managing to perform the difficult trick of ignoring uncomfortable developments and dwelling on the more favourable aspects of life.

Will the August advance continue, or has the market had its final fling before subsiding anxiously in the increasingly ominous shadow of the election?

Company results and div-

dends in the autumn reporting season are generally expected to be good. And there is growing evidence the nation is moving into a more prosperous period.

But such developments will not in themselves do much for shares. Interest rates and New York loom higher on the influence scale.

The latest Ken and Eddie show occurs on Wednesday. Although the market expects the Chancellor to reduce base rates, possibly to 5 per cent before next year's election, the general consensus is that he will leave them unchanged this time round.

New York no longer has the power over London it once enjoyed. But it is the world's biggest market and naturally when it reacts the rest sit up and take notice. As one dealer, reported in the daily newsletter from stockbroker Killick & Co, observed: "Of all major markets the UK market provides the best combination of values but it can't withstand a sustained US decline." America is currently beset by interest rates. US investors have passed the stage when they can expect reductions - they are fretting about an increase that will come sooner or later.

Deer US money will make the Chancellor's task to get rates down ahead of the election much more difficult. But Mr Clarke has been helped by the German rate cut and there is talk of more Bundesbank reductions.

New York's performance this week could be volatile ahead of Friday's payroll figures. They have in recent months established a maverick reputation, coming in well astray from forecasts and prompting a violent Wall Street reaction with the predictable impact in London and elsewhere.

Despite the uncertainties some are willing to put their heads on the block and forecast Footsie still has further to go. Merrill Lynch, the US-owned investment house, is one. It is looking for the index to test the 4,100-point barrier, although it is holding its year-end target at 3,900.

Arjo Wiggins Appletton, the packaging and paper group, is likely to be the Cinderella of this week's Footsie heavyweights reporting figures.

Paper groups around the world have struggled. But AWA has some spectacular difficulties of its own. It has issued two summertime profit warnings, the second last month. So the market is well prepared for another disappointment. An interim figure of £35m, against £135m, is the guess.

Chairman Cob Stenham has indicated that things are improving, prompting hopes of, say, £125m for the year. Two years ago the Anglo-French group achieved £217.1m.

Burnah Castrol, reporting interim figures today, is likely to achieve modest progress - around £127m against £117.1m. And Blue Circle Industries, the country's largest cement group, should tomorrow manage six-month results of £117m against £104.1m.

Cadbury Schweppes, half-time figures on Wednesday, has caused some uncertainty by pulling out of its UK soft drinks operation with Coca-Cola. It is developing in soft drinks elsewhere, particularly in the US through Dr Pepper. Profits are forecast to emerge at £228m, up from £206m.

Royal & Sun Alliance, the recently merged insurance group, rounds off the Footsie contribution. Interim results on Thursday should not contain any surprises - with operating profit down around 30 per cent to £340m.

Cookson, ousted from Foot-

sie last month to accommodate the Thorn EMI split, is another offering profit figures. Interim results are due on Thursday and the industrial materials group should achieve a small advance, say 5 per cent to £85.5m.

Its Footsie removal followed a sad share run with the price crashing from 327p in April to 256.5p last week. There are hopes the worst is over. Bruce MacDonald and David Allchurch at NatWest Securities say: "Given the market expects flat earnings and poor cash flow, much will depend upon the outlook statement. Essentially the shares will only recover lost ground if management convinces investors that the weakness is a short-term correction and long-term growth prospects remain intact."

They do not, however, believe Cookson will offer evidence happier days lie ahead and reduce the shares as a sell. Hillsdown Holdings, the food group, has not enjoyed the best of luck with its acquisition of Hobsons, the canning group which promised so much and failed to deliver.

Over the years the group has strayed into furniture and housebuilding, two areas which should increase contributions as the economy picks up. The various food interests are thought to have experienced mixed fortunes with the meat side a BSE victim. Interim profits on Thursday may be down, say £52.5m from £57.6m.

Two other food groups report interim results this week - Iceland, the frozen food supermarket chain, and Nurdin & Peacock, the cash and carry group. Both are likely to suffer profits dips. Iceland from £33.6m to £30m and N&P with its corner shop customers disappearing in the face of the supermarkets expansion, from £7.8m to £6.5m. But takeover worries should encourage higher dividend payments.

Eastern set to lose millions in dash for gas

CHRIS GODSMARK
Business Correspondent

Eastern Group, the regional electricity company bought by Hanson last year for £2.5bn, is facing mounting losses running into tens of millions of pounds from its aggressive assault on the commercial gas market.

Managers in charge of Eastern Natural Gas have not revealed the scale of the problems, but industry sources close to the company suggested its policy of grabbing market share by selling gas too cheaply has cost it at least £40m. In addition there are other huge losses incurred on so-called "take or pay" contracts to buy gas from North Sea fields at fixed prices well above the current market price.

For weeks the gas market has been rife with rumours that Eastern is about to cease taking on new customers in an attempt to sort out its existing difficulties – a charge the company vehemently denied. City analysts said the losses would have an impact on the valuation of Hanson Energy when the division, which also includes US coal mining operations, is demerged next year.

One source suggested those at the top of Eastern, and at its parent, Hanson, may not be fully aware of the scale of the problems. "The shareholders, in this case Hanson, are getting a raw deal over Eastern's venture into the gas market. They ought to know more about it than they apparently do at the moment," he explained.

The pace of Eastern's "dash for gas" has been astonishing, outstripping that of any rival electricity company. The idea was to lessen Eastern's exposure to the electricity business prior to the distribution price review being undertaken by the industry watchdog, Ofwat.

Just a year ago the company ranked sixth in the league table of suppliers to the competitive gas market, which covers everything from heavy household users to large industrial customers.

The latest unpublished industry sales figures suggest that since then Eastern has risen to second place in the business market, beaten only by British Gas. One consultancy said Eastern had actually surpassed British Gas in the large industrial market, taking as much as a 17 per cent share.

Since last year Eastern's sales force – believed to earn commission based on the volume of gas sold rather than the profitability of the contracts – has sold gas to customers for as little as 7p a therm and at an average price of around 10p. Yet in recent weeks the market price of gas, which collapsed in 1995, has recovered from 10p a therm to prices of 15p and above for delivery this autumn.

Eastern is thought to have contracts of this type to supply about 1 billion therms of gas this year at an estimated loss of 4p a therm, making total losses of £40m. Other independent gas suppliers also face losses on recent cheap contracts, but experts said Eastern's aggressive sales policy had worsened its exposure considerably.

In addition, losses on the company's take or pay contracts are potentially even greater. Eastern is believed to be committed to buying a further 1 billion therms of gas each year at around 19p-20p a therm, substantially higher than the market price. The company has signed a number of big contracts with gas producers, including a £400m deal arranged last year to buy the entire production of one North Sea field.

Some of these take or pay losses were reportedly written down in Hanson's balance sheet following the takeover. The last annual report includes a "fair value" adjustment to the balance sheet of minus £129m, to reflect what it described as "liabilities in respect of purchase contracts" incurred by the energy division.

However, the company's web of deals to supply gas to its own power stations and the wholesale market have disguised the true picture. Last week Trevor Turner, the head of Eastern Natural Gas, could not be contacted. But an Eastern spokesman insisted the business was profitable. "These are just mischievous rumours spread around by our competitors."

News of the problems may also affect Eastern's attack on the domestic market, with full competition for residential customers due in 1998. Eastern is selling gas at a 20 per cent discount to British Gas in the trial run of competition under way in Devon and Cornwall.

Forthcoming attraction: The one-seater Eurofighter 2000 will make its debut at Farnborough this week

Test milestone for Eurofighter

Another milestone in the development of the hugely expensive and seriously delayed Eurofighter 2000 took place over the weekend, with the maiden flight of the two-seater version of the aircraft, writes Chris Godsmark.

The sixth Eurofighter, constructed by Casa of Spain, took off from an airfield on Saturday for what was described as a successful test flight. More details of the flight will be given at the Farnborough Air Show, the UK's aerospace industry showcase, which opens to trade customers today.

The single-seater Eurofighter will also make its Farnborough flying debut this week. The project, which involves British Aerospace, Daimler-

Benz and Alenia of Italy in addition to Casa, is running three years late.

Last month the National Audit office said that the 48 per cent British stake in Eurofighter would cost an extra £1.25bn, taking the UK's contribution to £15.4bn.

One key topic of conversation at Farnborough will be the ongoing talks aimed at restructuring the European defence industry.

Last week BAE's head of commercial aircraft, Mike Turner, called at a conference for a further rationalisation of the defence sector to match the consolidation in the US.

Mr Turner said that Europe had 10 helicopter and aircraft producers compared with five in the US, and 11 missile contractors against just five in the US, despite the fact that the US defence budget is twice the size of Europe's.

"For the defence budget now available in Europe, we simply have too many contractors," Mr Turner said.

Another challenge for the European industry at Farnborough could be the possible launch of Boeing's enlarged version of the long-established jumbo-jet, the 747-500 and 600.

The plane, which will cost up to $230m (£150m) each and carry up to 550 passengers, is a serious challenge to the Airbus consortium, which has yet to decide whether to go ahead with the $8bn (£5bn) A3XX, an entirely new design.

Boeing has been intensively lobbying airlines to commit themselves to buying the 747-500/600 in order to launch the plane this week.

AEA gives 'no fat cats' pledge

CHRIS GODSMARK

AEA Technology, the science and contracting arm of the state-owned Atomic Energy Authority, yesterday gave a "cast-iron guarantee" that its £200m privatisation will involve "no fat-cattery", despite the fact that its chief executive recently netted £4m from the rail sell-off.

Peter Watson is also chairman of Porterbrook, the train leasing group taken over by Stagecoach last month for £825m. Porterbrook's employees together made £84m in the deal, with Mr Watson alone earning £4m on his 25,000 shares.

AEA publishes its flotation prospectus today, which will be aimed at institutions and sophisticated private investors, the so-called "Jeremys" rather than "Sids". The document will give details of the business, which has a technical and advisory role in the decommissioning of nuclear power stations, but has increasingly diversified into non-nuclear work such as project management.

The prospectus will not put a market value on the company, though it is likely to be in the region of £200m.

It will be a distinctly low-key privatisation with none of the advertising associated with bigger sell-offs. Individual share applications must be made through a broker, with the minimum investment expected to be substantially greater than in the sell-off of Railtrack or British Energy. Most shares are expected to go to City institutions.

Company sources played down any suggestion that the flotation could bring substantial windfall gains for directors.

Labour attacks the jobs that don't last

DIANE COYLE
Economics Editor

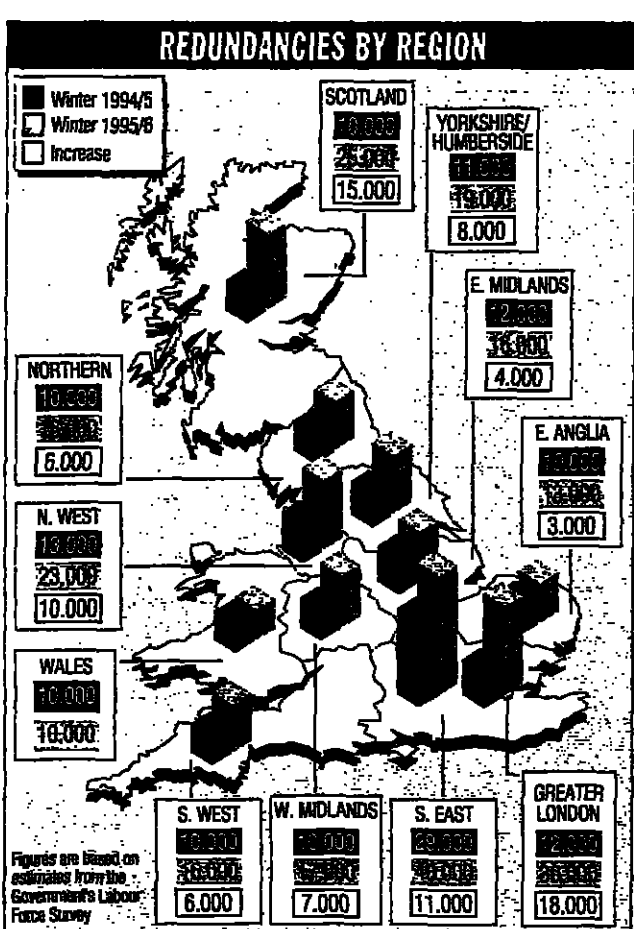

The number of redundancies has doubled and more than half of the newly unemployed had a job that lasted less than a year, according to a Labour Party analysis published today as part of its campaign on job insecurity.

The figures, compiled from official sources, show that between the winter of 1994/95 and last winter there was an increase of 106,000 in the number of redundancies in Great Britain. This took the total during the December-February quarter to 225,000, back near its level two years earlier.

There were particularly big increases in the numbers made redundant in Greater London, the West Midlands, the North and Scotland.

In addition, 58 per cent of people making a new unemployment-related benefit claim between October 1995 and January 1996 had claimed benefit less than 12 months previously. In some regions the proportion was far higher, rising to nearly two-thirds in the North.

Labour claimed the figures were further proof of the existence of a "revolving door" economy characterised by growing insecurity despite the drop in the unemployment total. Shadow Employment spokesman Ian Macartney said: "Officially the number of people unemployed and claiming benefit may be falling, but only months after they signed off the dole many thousands of people are finding themselves back in the JobCentre again."

He added: "Skilled, well-paid and full-time jobs are still disappearing in every area of the country, and new jobs are mainly poorly paid, insecure and temporary."

The Labour claims follow government attempts to play down the idea that falling unemployment has been achieved at the cost of casualising the labour force. Treasury minister William Waldegrave recently pointed to figures indicating that the average length of tenure in a job had fallen very little over recent years, and had actually risen for women.

However, a growing body of research points to the existence of a low-pay ghetto from which people find it difficult to escape into more secure and rewarding jobs.

A recent study by Paul Gregg and Jonathan Wadsworth, researchers at the London School of Economics, reported that the earnings gap between entry jobs for the unemployed and the stock of jobs held by the majority in work has widened enormously.

Nearly a third of entry jobs filled by the non-employed pay less than a quarter of median weekly earnings. The typical entry job pays about £100 a week.

Four million 'to lose out' on Channel 5

MATHEW HORSMAN
Media Editor

Channel 5 Broadcasting, the backers of Britain's fifth terrestrial channel, yesterday accused the Government of depriving up to 2 million British households, or 4 million viewers, of the ability to receive the Channel 5 signal.

According to David Elstein, the newly appointed chief executive of Channel 5 Broadcasting, a request to use an additional frequency to transmit the new service was being resisted by the Department of Trade & Industry and the Radio Communications Authority, which want to reserve it for mobile television and radio digital services on trains and buses.

The fifth terrestrial service, to be launched on 1 January 1997, has already been allocated Channel 37, used by many VCRs for their playback signal, necessitating a £100m door-to-door retuning exercise. Earlier this year, Channel 5 requested that Channel 35, reserved for digital services, be released.

Mr Elstein claimed that Channel 5 would then reach 78 rather than 70 per cent of British households. The Independent Television Commission, which regulates commercial television in the UK, yesterday reiterated its support for Channel 5's request, saying: "We certainly believe that Channel 5 should get the maximum coverage. It would enhance the services to viewers, and those who can't receive will wonder why."

According to a source at Channel 5, several towns, including Worcester, will find themselves divided as to reception, with perhaps half of homes unable to watch the new service. Other towns, particularly in the East Midlands, would also be affected.

Channel 5 is asking for a meeting with the DTI to discuss the issue, while a select committee of the House of Commons is scheduled to debate the frequency question this autumn.

A spokesman for the DTI said yesterday: "We have stated our position. Looking to the future, we believe a better use of Channel 35 would be for mobile television services, which might be introduced in the next four or five years."

Mr Elstein said: "To deprive 4 million people of Channel 5 now for the sake of possibly bringing in mobile digital broadcasting services in four or five years seems a very curious set of priorities. Given the rate of the technological advance we are experiencing in broadcasting, surely another means will be found of delivering digital mobile services if they are relevant in five years."

It is understood that the disagreement between the DTI and the ITC, which is overseen by the Department of National Heritage, was part of a continuing jurisdictional battle, made more bitter in light of the convergence between telecommunications and broadcasting in the digital age.

Virgin move into books opens a new chapter

NIGEL COPE

The Virgin Megastore chain is about to launch a full-scale attack on the UK book market with a range of titles aimed at its "youth" audience. Virgin hopes to achieve book sales of £25m-£30m by 1999 which would place it among Britain's top 10 booksellers with a similar market share to the Books Etc chain.

The move into books is part of a strategy to improve sales at the Virgin-Our Price chain and capitalise more on the links between the various parts of the Virgin empire. It is testing a "Virtual Megastore" format that will enable shoppers to enter even the smallest branch of Our Price and order from the full range of the Virgin Megastore in London's Oxford Street.

It also hopes to introduce systems that will enable shoppers at Virgin and Our Price stores to book cinema tickets at its cinema chain acquired last year.

Virgin has been running a bookselling trial in four of its stores since last December. It plans to introduce books to 20 stores by Christmas and all 32 of the largest megastores by next May. The range will include books by "cult" authors such as Irvine Welsh, Harper Lee, Ian Banks and JD Salinger. Other sections will include music and film titles as well as science fiction, sport, gay and lesbian and "new age" books on subjects such as transcendental meditation.

Simon Burke, managing director of Virgin-Our Price, said books represented a good opportunity: "We've tested a book range in stores like Nottingham, Bromley and Oxford and it's gone very well. We will try to stock mostly modern titles that are slightly controversial."

If Virgin succeeds in achieving book sales of £30m, that would give it a 2 per cent share of Britain's £1.6bn book market. According to retail consultants Verdict Research, WH Smith has the largest share with 25 per cent through its core chain and the Waterstone's business. Dillons is the second-largest with 9 per cent.

Verdict's Clive Vaughan says: "It seems like a good idea. There are some good obvious synergies and the titles they are stocking will appeal to its fairly young audience."

Virgin plans to open 80 new megastores over the next three years.

IN BRIEF

• Allders has agreed to buy eight department stores from Philip Green's Owen Owen group for £23.6m. The stores are those in Coventry, Ipswich, Basingstoke, Ilford, Redditch and Slough, plus the Lewis's stores in Leeds and Oxford. They will be refurbished at a cost of £15m during the next two years. Allders has also announced a special dividend of about £50m, worth 46p a share.

• Senior executives of Charterhouse, the City merchant bank, made profits of £12.7m on an investment of just £89,000, as part of the controversial sale of Porterbrook, the British Rail rolling stock leasing company, to Stagecoach earlier this year. The revelation is contained in an article in the London Financial News, published today. According to the paper, the senior Charterhouse executives, who include Victor Blank, chairman, and Gordon Bonnyman, managing director of development capital, also stand to make an additional £19m as their share of the bank's own profits on the deal. The individuals invested personally alongside the bank's own private fund, Charterhouse Capital Partners Five. The Porterbrook sale netted £80m for company directors.

• The pay of working women in the US fell in the early 1990s after rising for more than a decade, according to the study by the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think-tank in Washington. The State of Working America reports that between 1989 and 1995 the typical male worker's hourly wages fell 6.3 per cent, after inflation. The typical working woman's wages fell 1.7 per cent over the same period, reversing some of the 5.7 per cent increase experienced in the 1980s. Corporate chief executives' pay soared to 173 times that of the average worker in 1995, from a multiple of 122 in 1989 and about 60 in 1978.

• A new Labour government should set up an independent agency to predict the government's budget position, according to the journal Economic Policy, published today by the Institute for Public Policy Research. Professor Simon Wren-Lewis of Exeter University writes that the extra credibility an independent assessment would give to borrowing forecasts would allow interest rates to be lower than otherwise.

• A windfall tax on British Telecommunications would play into the hands of the company's foreign rivals, Don Cruickshank, the industry regulator, said. Asked about the Labour party's plans for a tax on the past profits of Britain's privatised utilities, Mr Cruickshank said: "It does seem odd in telecoms to tax one of the companies in one of the most important industries for the UK in the future. Some of the foreign competitors would, I guess, quietly approve."

• Swiss-based Winterthur Insurance said it proposes to form a joint venture with Skipton Building Society. Winterthur Life, the company's UK life insurance and pensions unit, said the move signalled its intention to be a major player in mortgage services.

• GEC meets the Association of British Insurers today to discuss the controversial £10m pay and options package for its incoming chief executive, George Simpson. The company is expected to agree to toughen Mr Simpson's performance criteria to head off a showdown at its annual meeting on Friday.

Pharm labour: the humble sheep is playing a key role in pharmaceutical companies' search for wonder drugs, such as the genetically engineered treatment for cystic fibrosis

HOW TO BECOME A PHARMER

GRAPHIC: KRISTINA FERRIS

Milking them for all they're worth

Genetically engineered animals are yielding human proteins to combat hereditary disease – and to make a fortune for the breeders. Stephen Day reports

The most closely watched sheep in the world are probably a flock grazing at a location near Edinburgh. Each identified by its own implanted microchip, these sheep have the biotech equivalent of the golden fleece. They carry the human gene for a protein called alpha-1-antitrypsin (AAT) and secrete large amounts of human AAT into their milk. With the help of an £8m milking parlour and neighbouring extraction plant, PPL Therapeutics, the sheep's owner, is now preparing to test an AAT aerosol to combat the symptoms of cystic fibrosis.

Showing that a good pun sticks, PPL's route into the pharmaceuticals market is generally called "pharming". The company is far from the only "pharmer" out there. Small flocks and herds of genetically engineered cows, sheep, goats, pigs and even rabbits are being milked for human proteins at various secure farms around the world. The lure of "pharming" is that genetically engineered animals can produce complex human proteins that are either impossible or impractical to make by any other method. Some simple compounds such as insulin are now made by vats of genetically engineered bacteria, yeast or animal cells.

However, these systems cannot produce the most complex human proteins efficiently. In contrast, farm animals secrete complex proteins into their milk naturally. Companies like PPL have hijacked this process by hooking human genes on to appropriate controlling regions of DNA. Injecting the human gene into the DNA of a fertilised egg, and placing the egg in a surrogate mother, can then produce a genetically engineered animal that secretes a human protein into its milk.

It's a painstaking business. The injected gene may not integrate into the egg's DNA and, even if it does, the animal may not produce much of the human protein. But once researchers create even one high-yielding animal, conventional breeding opens the way to an unlimited supply – the inserted human genes, being incorporated into the sheep's genome, can pass from generation to generation like normal genes.

Some of the sheep grazing near Edinburgh are the great, great granddaughters of PPL's original genetically engineered sheep. The AAT-producing flock now numbers around 200 and is giving enough AAT for clinical trials to begin, probably around the end of this year.

According to PPL's managing director, Ron James, the AAT protein cannot cure cystic

AAT from sheep can already be used to treat hereditary emphysema fibrosis, but it may help prevent one of the disease's most damaging symptoms – the destruction of the lung lining. The natural function of AAT is to inhibit the activity of an enzyme called elastase that the body uses to destroy dead or damaged tissue. "The role of elastase is to chew up bits of tissue as part of a process called tissue remodelling," says James. "This is particularly important in the lungs." In people with cystic fibrosis, however, frequent lung infections lead to an influx of disease-fighting white blood cells which release extra elastase into the lungs.

Normally, the extra elastase is useful because it removes disease-damaged tissue. But after repeated infections it causes a breakdown in the lining of the lung that is eventually fatal. PPL's trial will see whether patients with cystic fibrosis can rein in the effects of the excess elastase by spraying AAT directly into their lungs. According to James, the initial trial will be very small, involving tens rather than hundreds of patients. If the early results are positive, the company may move to larger trials in the middle of next year.

However successful the trial may be, PPL's sheep have a secure future in providing AAT to treat another lung disease, hereditary emphysema – a fatal disorder causing lung damage similar to that resulting from cystic fibrosis. It stems from a genetic inability to produce sufficient AAT and often remains unnoticed until middle age when lung damage results in shortness of breath. In cystic fibrosis, the damage is caused by too much elastase in the lungs. In hereditary emphysema, the elastase level is normal, but there is not enough AAT. Doctors can sometimes halt lung degeneration in emphysema sufferers by injecting AAT extracted from donated blood, but currently this treatment is available only to patients in the US and Germany; there is just not enough AAT to go around. To treat just one patient for one year requires all the AAT from about 100 litres of blood.

In contrast, just a couple of thousand genetically-engineered sheep would be sufficient to meet the world demand.

This ability to produce large amounts of otherwise very scarce proteins explains why drug-producing livestock roam in other places besides the Edinburgh area. PPL's sister company in Virginia has genetically engineered pigs to secrete an anti-blood-clotting agent called Protein C into their milk. The company is also working on genetically-engineered rabbits and cows.

Another company, Gen-

zyme Transgenics in Massachusetts, breeds genetically engineered goats whose milk holds a different clot-digesting drug, called tissue-plasminogen activator. Finally, Gene Pharming Europe, in Leiden in the Netherlands, is breeding cows that produce the human version of lactoferrin, a protein that captures free iron atoms and binds them in its structure. Lactoferrin is doubly useful because although our bodies can use iron that is bound to the protein, many bacteria cannot. So on the one hand, lactoferrin could help to treat anaemia by delivering iron to patients, while on the other, the protein could inhibit bacterial infections by soaking up iron and starving bacteria of the metal.

Sheep, pigs, rabbits, cows, goats – why are the pharmers using so many different breeds of animal? Part of the reason is the trade-off between speed and size. It takes less time to breed genetically engineered rabbits than genetically engineered cows, but the cows will produce the most milk in the long run. In fact, genetically engineered cows' milk may capture the biggest market of all – baby formula. The major proteins in cows' milk differ significantly from those in human milk. This makes cows' milk less suitable for human babies. It may also contribute to allergies. Pharming could solve the problem.

"I think it's quite feasible that you could make milk that contained human versions of the three, four, or five major proteins," says James. However, completely "human" milk from cows is not on the agenda. According to James, the best approach is to identify the key proteins and replace those. "There are a host of other minor proteins. I don't see any way in the near future that you could get a complete replacement," he says. "Nor do I think it would be necessary."

Despite the medical logic of "pharming", it is still conceivable that the public will reject the approach. To strengthen the industry's hand, PPL points out that there appear to be no effects of genetically engineering their sheep beyond the production of AAT in the animals' milk. Furthermore, lambs drinking the AAT-rich milk grow normally. Since each sheep has the potential to produce about £65,000 worth of AAT per year, PPL has every reason to take good care of them. The genetically-engineered sheep come from scrapie-free New Zealand stock and live on a strictly vegetarian diet.

More cynically, companies like PPL could defend themselves by pointing to more tempting targets for potential opponents to focus on. A few years ago, researchers in Australia produced fast-growing "superpigs" by giving them extra copies of a growth hormone gene. But there were no medical benefits – especially not for the pigs. Unlike PPL's sheep, the only benefit superpigs offer is the chance to produce more pork more quickly.

Property company privatised by government three years ago is resold at huge profit

JOHN RENTOUL
Political Correspondent

A property company sold by the Government for £11.4m only three years ago has been re-sold for a profit of more than £70m. Half the profit will be shared by three people, in a deal which revives Labour accusations that "fat cats" are making a killing at the expense of the taxpayer.

The company, which has traded profitably since it was bought by a consortium in 1993, has been re-sold for £84.6m.

Dr Wilem Frischmann and Sudhu Prabhu, whose consulting company led the consortium, have made £18m and £12m respectively. Another £7m goes to Trevor Osborne, a property developer who helped to broker the deal. The rest of the profit goes to Amec, the building company which was their consortium partner.

Derek Foster, Labour's civil service spokesman, condemned the re-sale of a part of the Property Services Agency (PSA) as evidence that the taxpayer had been "ripped off". The Independent yesterday revealed that the Government's net worth has declined from £20bn in the black to £15.2bn in the red under the Conservatives.

And this deal follows news of the profit of £40m cashed-in a month ago by three directors of Porterbrook rail leasing company seven months after it was privatised, when the company was bought by Stagecoach.

Dr Frischmann was born in Hungary and trained as a structural engineer to pursue a life-long interest in tall buildings. As a young man he worked on Centre Point and the NatWest Tower, and more recently on Canary Wharf. He, his son Richard and Mr Prabhu own the civil engineering consultants Pell Frischmann, which led the consortium which bought two divisions of the PSA. At first glance it seems we have become fat cats, he told The Independent. "But we took risks. The Government had good value. And the staff are the best-off. We have ensured permanency of employment for about 1,800 civil servants."

The Government guaranteed the cost of the first 1,000 redundancies, but the consortium still faced a potential £50m bill for lay-offs which was not underwritten by the Government. None of this was needed, and restructuring costs were met out of profits. The consortium had not even paid the whole purchase price – it was given terms over four years.

Dr Frischmann said that he would reinvest the profit in Private Finance Initiative projects. "I'm not going to buy a yacht or something." The PSA, which ran Whitehall buildings and managed government building projects, was sold in 1993 by John Redwood, a leading advocate of privatisation and then a junior environment minister. The agency had been dogged by allegations of fraud, and a breakdown in financial systems.

The divisions of PSA bought by Pell Frischmann included the part which managed Buckingham Palace, the Houses of Parliament and the Government's Whitehall buildings.

The sale was criticised by the National Audit Office earlier this year, because the Government made an "unusual" £14m unsecured loan to cover cash-flow problems in the loss-making parts of the business.

The company, which is now called Building and Property Management Services (BPMS), manages buildings mostly for the Ministry of Defence, having been guaranteed £400m-worth of government work over five years. A few months ago it cleaned the face of Big Ben.

A week ago, BPMS was bought by CVC Capital Partners, a venture capital fund, on behalf of its own management.

Both Pell Frischmann and BPMS are now bidding for an even bigger prize: the contract to manage all the Department of Social Security's property. And Pell Frischmann's partner Mr Osborne, the boss of Spey-hawk property group which crashed with debts of £300m three years ago, has long been interested in bidding for armed forces homes, worth an estimated £2bn.

For Labour, Mr Foster said: "With the sale of the DSS estate and MoD homes on the agenda, the Tories clearly cannot be trusted. This is asset stripping on a grand scale."

The strange case of the Home Secretary and the drug dealers. Was he tricked?

PATRICIA WYNN DAVIES

The two drugs dealers who sparked an outcry over their early release fooled the authorities by tipping off Customs & Excise about a cache of their own illegal weapons, according to underworld sources.

Michael Howard, the Home Secretary, came under a welter of criticism at the weekend for agreeing to a judge's request for 18-year sentences on John Haase and Paul Bennett to be cut to just five in return for co-operating with the authorities. It was widely assumed the move was because they had supplied high-level information about the so-called £15 million "Turish connection" heroin-smuggling ring in Liverpool.

But the criminal world believes that after their arrest on heroin trafficking charges, Haase, 46, and Bennett, 32, perpetrated an elaborate confidence trick by alerting Customs to a consignment of Kalashnikovs and Armaletes which they had purchased themselves out the proceeds of drug deals. Key elements of this version of events have been backed up by a security source.

Sources said yesterday that far from behaving like informers or "supergrasses" in fear of their lives, they had openly returned to Liverpool after being released on parole last month.

Haase and Bennett were arrested in 1993 after Bennett, a married man, dropped a girlfriend when she began using heroin. The woman informed on him to a Merseyside police detective constable.

On remand in prison, Haase and Bennett are said to have demanded to speak to Customs, figuring they might have a better chance of avoiding a lengthy jail term than if they tried to negotiate with the police. They promised Customs they would supply information about a consignment of weapons on board a ship heading for Liverpool. The ship was already in Liverpool docks, the container's door protected with bags of Semtex.

Bomb disposal experts blew the doors off, revealing 50 weapons and some heroin. Haase and Bennett then gave addresses where more firearms and heroin could be found. They suggested they had helped expose an arms network that was supplying the IRA.

But sources insisted yesterday that they had betrayed no big-time drugs dealer, either British or Turkish. Neither Customs nor the Home Office were prepared to comment yesterday on the usefulness of the information the pair may have given. The pair had turned down offers of protection and help to start new lives away from Merseyside. The first trial judge at Liverpool Crown Court, Judge David Lynch, knew about any help they may have given was when he received a Customs report after the 1995 trial.

Haase and Bennett had pleaded guilty to conspiracy to supply heroin, along with Edward Croker, their first lieutenant.

Haase and Bennett received 18 years and each had £840,000 confiscated. Croker was jailed for 14 years and had £110,000 confiscated. Yilmaz Kaya, 20, was jailed for 20 years and had £200,000 confiscated. Four other Turks were jailed for between four and 14 years for related offences.

The judge emphasised the need for heavy sentences, but after receiving the Customs report, he wrote to Mr Howard requesting authorisation to cut the jail term to five years. With parole and two years served on remand, they were released after serving less than a year of their sentence.

Crime puts death penalty on South African agenda

MARY BRAID
Johannesburg

In an extraordinary turnaround, the African National Congress, which for years lost guerrillas and activists to apartheid hangers-on, is reconsidering its opposition to the death penalty.

South Africa's post-apartheid surge in violent crime, which has tarnished the country's image, has spurred ANC policy-makers to make their most radical law-and-order recommendation yet. It came after a special weekend security summit attended by cabinet ministers and grassroots members.

The ANC has always been vociferously opposed to the death penalty. Hangings were stopped in 1990 when the National Party introduced political reforms, and no one has been executed in South Africa since.

When Nelson Mandela gave his famously defiant speech from the dock in 1964 before being sent to prison, he did it believing he faced the death penalty. But the rethink follows President Mandela's own admission three days ago that crime in South Africa is "out of control".

A series of attacks on high-profile victims in the last few weeks has highlighted the epidemic of murders, violent assaults and car hijacking. The father of soccer hero Doctor Khumalo was murdered by car-jackers outside his Soweto home and a leading German industrialist was shot in his driveway by carjackers.

This week, the army and air force and 1,000 extra police officers were drafted into Johannesburg as part of a new offensive on crime. It is headed by two former Angolan war veterans who have promised to bring bush combat methods "to the jungle of Johannesburg".

The past few weeks, one of the country's leading judges was robbed in his home, and the Justice Minister, Dullah Omar, was forced to move his family to a safe house following violent confrontations between drug barons and Asian vigilantes in Cape Town. The vigilantes, frustrated at the government's apparent inability to curb crime, killed one gang leader by setting him on fire.

The security summit has asked the ANC's national executive committee to look at capital punishment again.

Reinstatement would breach the new democratic South Africa's constitution. But the pressure from ordinary people – black and white – on the government to come up with some answers is reaching fever pitch. The decision to make the recommendation drew loud applause from delegates.

Heart of the matter

Swinging sale

Carnaby Street, once the heart of swinging London, and a shopping mecca for generations of style-conscious youngsters, is up for sale. The street and its surroundings, including 93 buildings, are likely to attract bids of more than £70m. Page 3.

"You're not sure your health insurance will pay my bill, are you?"

Until now, buying a cheaper private healthplan was almost compromising on the amount of cover you got. But Primecare, a new policy from Prime Health, actually gives you comprehensive cover – at a budget price.

So, if you're buying a policy, ask yourself: does it cover out-patient treatment, like specialist consultations? Does it give you immediate access to private treatment? Does it guarantee full payment of surgeons' and anaesthetists' fees? Will it pay for alternative medicine?

Primecare gives you all this. For more details, call us now quoting reference no. MO2495NG

ANTHONY BEVINS and CHRIS GODSMARK

Michael Portillo, Secretary of State for Defence, yesterday committed Britain to spending £15.3bn at current prices on 232 Eurofighters.

The deal for the planes, which are being built by Britain, Germany, Italy and Spain, is said to have secured 14,000 jobs in the British defence industry. That works out at £1m for each job, or £66m for each aircraft.

Labour and the Liberal Democrats locked themselves into the decision, welcoming it as a necessary enhancement of the RAF's defence capability.

The only hint of qualification came from the Liberal Democrat spokesman Menzies Campbell, who confined himself to caution about cost and time overruns on a project that is already £1.3bn over budget and three years late.

John Weston, chairman of British Aerospace's defence division, said at Farnborough Air Show that the total project would be only 7 per cent over budget. "We think that's not a bad record for a programme of this complexity," he said.

The single-seater Eurofighter made a dramatic debut at the show in front of hundreds of trade and press spectators yesterday.

John Turner, the RAF test pilot, was ecstatic about the aircraft's capabilities. "I have to say you really feel like a king in this," he said. "We want someone to come and attack us so you can really see what this aircraft can do."

The project's official title, "Eurofighter 2000", had become something of a joke in the industry as the delivery date slipped towards 2005.

British Aerospace, however, insisted that many of the complex computer software problems which have dogged the development have now been solved. Managers were "absolutely confident" that the first planes bound for the RAF would be in service in 2001.

Though the UK is now apparently behind full-scale production, the Germans have yet to commit themselves to firm orders. The German parliament is due to vote on the project, which envisages 180 Eurofighters for Germany's air force, by the end of this year.

But Michael Heseltine, the Deputy Prime Minister, who opened the air show and who helped to initiate the project in 1983, was confident that the Germans would give the Eurofighter their full backing.

Mr Portillo said: "Today's announcement is excellent news for the Royal Air Force."

"It represents a crucial step forward towards providing them with a multi-role aircraft with the operational flexibility to respond to the uncertain challenges of the next century."

"The four-nation Eurofighter programme will ensure that the European aerospace industry remains at the forefront of technology."

The Eurofighter will be assembled at British Aerospace sites in Lancashire while Rolls-Royce will manufacture the engines, primarily at Bristol and Derby.

Dr David Clark, shadow secretary of state for defence, said: "For too long ministers have played politics with the jobs of our defence workers. The Eurofighter is vital to meet the future requirements of our armed forces."

While the Liberal Democrats joined the uncritical welcome, Mr Campbell added: "The industrial implications of this project are as significant as the military ones, but the Government must show a higher degree of financial control. Cost overruns on Eurofighter will only damage the rest of the defence budget."

SIGNIFICANT SHORTS

Governors at a Nottinghamshire primary school were meeting last night to try to avert a teachers' strike over a disruptive pupil. Talks between union leaders and the local authority yesterday failed to resolve the dispute over ten-year-old Matthew Wilson.

Members of the National Association of Schoolmasters' Union of Women Teachers (NASUWT) at Manton Junior School near Worksop say they will refuse to teach Matthew who is due to return to school next Monday. Governors have twice overruled the school's head, who tried to expel the boy last term for allegedly disruptive behaviour.

In another case in West Yorkshire, the parents of a 13-year-old withdrew her from school after NASUWT members had threatened to strike over her. Janet Ford

Hopes rose of an end to the postal dispute as union leaders decided to postpone a decision on industrial action. The decision came after management claimed that "record" numbers of employees turned up for work during the eighth 24-hour stoppage yesterday by the Communication Workers' Union. The union is understood to have come close on Saturday to ordering a ballot on the latest offer from the Royal Mail after pressure from the Labour Party leadership.

The postal executive of the union was due to meet today to take a decision on fresh disruption, but will now decide on Thursday, following an assessment of the mood of the membership. A month-long suspension of the Royal Mail's monopoly on delivering letters is also due to expire on Thursday. Ministers have warned that more industrial action will mean a further three-month suspension. Barrie Clement

The funeral service of vicar Christopher Gray was held yesterday, just yards from the spot where he met a violent death in the grounds of his own church. The Bishop of Liverpool, David Sheppard, told mourners Christopher was "a centre of resistance" to the destructive forces of violence, fatalism and despair. Christopher, 32, died to death after being stabbed in the grounds of St Margaret's Parish Church early on 13 August. A 31-year-old man has been remanded in custody by magistrates charged with his murder.

Some 300 mourners crowded into the bright contemporary church at a busy road junction in Anfield, Liverpool, where the talented young priest had made such an impression during his 15 months as vicar. Another 200 heard a Requiem mass service relayed to them through speakers in the neighbouring parish centre.

The major loyalist paramilitary organisations yesterday denied responsibility for Sunday night's pipe-bomb attack on the parents of an associate of leading loyalist Billy Wright. The parents of Alex Kerr, who like Mr Wright is under a death-threat, were shocked when the explosive device was tossed through the window of their home in south Belfast. They were protected from the blast by a chair.

Mr Kerr is presently held in prison awaiting trial on a charge relating to a loyalist paramilitary organisation. Mr Wright, condemning the attack, declared: "How can they call themselves loyalists if they carry out this attack on loyalist pensioners?" David McKinnick

Complaints about noisy neighbours rose by 10 per cent last year, according to the Chartered Institute of Environmental Health. This continues a trend which has lasted for a decade. Britons are increasingly plagued by loud music, barking dogs and the din of DIY activities going on late into the night, and they are more prepared and better informed about complaining to their local council.

The institute's survey of 300 local councils found there were 144,943 complaints last year, or nearly 400 a day. Nicholas Schell

The much-hyped musical Voyeurz, notoriously featuring nudity, nipple-clamps and black leather, has been axed by its West End venue after less than two months. The show was conceived by impresario Michael White, who staged Oh Calcutta!, and audiences were treated to simulated lesbian sex and exotic outfits at a reported cost of £1m.

Such was the musical's high profile that it attracted hordes of dancers to its West End auditions and won a visit from the actor Jack Nicholson. He appeared in numerous tabloid pictures to be having a whale of a time. But, perhaps as a result of the extraordinary PR effort which won it so much publicity, it was damned by almost every reviewer and has been given two weeks' notice by the Whitehall Theatre. Marianne Macdonald

A Benedictine monk who devoted his life to bee-keeping has died at Buckfast Abbey, south Devon, aged 98. Brother Adam, who died on Sunday, became a member of the Buckfast community at the age of 12. Brother Adam bred the highly-productive Buckfast super bee over a 60-year period, travelling 100,000 miles around the world in the process.

For sale: slightly faded slice of Sixties history

MICHAEL STREETER

For sale: a three-acre section of central London. Main feature: a slice of British cultural history. Thirty years after it became synonymous with the Swinging Sixties and a mecca for the fashion-conscious, Carnaby Street is for sale.

The famous road and its surrounding area, which includes 93 buildings, are likely to attract bids of more than £70m, a huge outlay palliated by the current annual rental income of £5.8m.

The street itself offers 250 yards of boutiques and shops between Oxford Street and Regent Street. When Time magazine announced in 1966 that London was "swinging" it was Carnaby Street that was the centre of attraction.

The male boutique originated there: fashion designers such as John Stephen, who once owned nine shops, and Mary Quant led the way, and models, pop stars and emerging media figures thronged west Soho. The Who and The Beatles were habitués.

Hari Bhargava, manager of Gear, one of only two shops in the street to keep its name from that era, remembers the kudos of working there. "I came in 1966 and at that time working in Carnaby Street was the next best thing to being a pop star."

The Who sang on a parked lorry. Herman's Hermits were around, also the Hollies, and the Bee Gees sang just across the road. I had friends who asked if they could work with me for nothing, just so they could mingle with everyone!

He added: "It was a special place in the Sixties. It's not so lively, and it's a bit like anywhere else now."

Others agree that the street has lost its uniqueness. Designer John Stephen, who set the trend for boutiques with blaring pop music and clothes on rails, recently described it as a "market place... just a souk".

Yet among the ubiquitous high street names - including Boots and Dunkin' Donuts - there are still specialist shops, such as The Great Frog which makes silver jewellery for, among others, the Britpop top group Oasis.

Fab: (from top) 'Welcome to Carnaby Street'; a party outside 'Gear', the shop which started it all in 1967; two girls browse in the still-trendy street in the early-Seventies; a boutique in the road's heyday; the Mods return - The Jam in Carnaby Street in the late Seventies; and now - souvenir shops tempt tourists with memories of a former glory

Damages awarded to man who rushed to wife's bedside

Victory for father who watched birth

A father who was sacked for taking time off to be present at the birth of his daughter was unfairly dismissed, an industrial tribunal ruled today.

Robert Stennings, 39, had been refused permission to be at his wife's bedside. When he told his employer, Michael Johnson, that he was going to attend the birth, he was told: "Don't bother coming back."

Mr Johnson, 46, the head of Supa Heat central heating distributors, where Mr Stennings worked as a driver and warehouseman, told the Manchester hearing: "My company won't revoke around the birth of a child and I don't think that is unreasonable."

"It wasn't an emergency. It was routine. Somebody's having a baby. My wife has had a baby - they are popping out all over the place."

The tribunal awarded £1,735 to Mr Stennings, whose wife, Christine, gave birth to a 7lb daughter, Charlotte, after deciding Mr Johnson had acted unreasonably.

But they held that Mr Stennings, of West Avenue, Burnage, Manchester, was 50% to blame because he had told his firm he was going to take time off, rather than make a request.

Mr Stennings, now a packer for a biscuit firm, said: "I am absolutely delighted by the result. I would do the same again. A man should be at his wife's side. I have always been convinced I was in the right."

The tribunal was told that Mr Stennings had worked for the three-man firm in Ancoats, Manchester, for 10 years. But when he told his boss he was to be a father, Mr Johnson had said: "Don't expect time off for hospital appointments."

Mr Stennings told the hearing: "Mr Johnson said a pilot or a ship's captain would not be able to turn back a flight or a cruise because of the birth of a baby. I thought that was a ludicrous comparison."

Mr Johnson had told him he could not be present at the birth unless he gave a definite date. Mr Stennings booked a week's holiday, but on the Friday lunchtime before it was to start, he received a call to tell him his wife was in labour at St. Mary's Hospital, Manchester.

Mr Johnson said he had suggested that Mr Stennings booked two weeks' holiday to increase the chances of the baby being born while he was off, but that Mr Stennings had refused.

He said Mr Stennings' wish to stop work at short notice said I needed to be by my wife's side," said Mr Stennings, whose wife was at the hearing. "He said not to bother coming back."

Mr Johnson, who is planning to retire by 2000, said afterwards: "I am disappointed with the result. I appreciate it was a very special occasion for Mr Stennings but he should have more respect for my company and its customers. It is another nail in the coffin of small businesses."

Mrs Stennings said outside the hearing: "It was very important for Robert to be there. I had been in hospital with high blood pressure the week before with the stress of not knowing whether he would be at the birth."

Riddle of sands haunts parents

CHARLIE BAIN

Within the confines of their rented cottage in west Norfolk, the parents of Jodi and Tom Loughlin were last night preparing to come to terms with life without their two children.

The last vestiges of hope for the couple hung on a post-mortem examination of the body of a young boy found on Sheringham beach on Sunday, which police fear could be that of their four-year-old son, Tom.

As the couple prepared to head home to Norwood, south London, they were nowhere nearer discovering what exactly happened that fateful Sunday on Holme beach, when Jodi and Tom ran through crowds of families towards the sea.

Over the past two weeks, the press and public have pondered a tragedy that has stirred the hearts of the nation. The same unanswerable questions have been thrown up again and again, as people have tried to solve what has been termed the "riddle of the sands".

How could the two children have wandered so far in just five minutes, which was the time their parents said they were out of sight? Why at no point did they call their children's names or, more surprisingly, why didn't they ask anyone if they had seen them? How could there have been so much confusion over the spot where the family was?

Within hours of the children going missing the tidal experts were drawing their own conclusions. One coastguard said the two children could have stumbled into one of a number of channels etched into the sands at Holme, which were deceptively deep. A child could quickly find himself up to his neck in sea water. Others said a strong gust of wind could have blown them into the waves.

But eyewitnesses say the sea was as "calm as a millpond" that day and that the children could not have been swept out to sea. For Colin Sturman, district controller of Great Yarmouth Coastguard, who helped with the search, the disappearance of Jodi and Tom will remain an eternal mystery.

"It was flat calm that evening," recalls Mr Sturman. "There were no strong winds, there was no heavy surf, it was totally benign."

"To this day, the only possible scenario I can imagine is that the children went out to a sandbank and were cut off by the sea as the tide came in."

Another factor was the volume of people on the beach that day. The sands were particularly busy that weekend as Hunstanton was celebrating its 150th anniversary. Thousands of holiday makers crowded the beach and it would have been easy to lose sight of a young child among the mass of bodies.

As the quiet Norfolk resort of Holme next the Sea returns to normalcy again this week, the truth behind the tragic deaths seems doomed to be confined to the waves of the Wash.

Simple test could put an end to early births

Thousands of women could be prevented from giving birth prematurely by taking a simple £90 test, a leading baby charity said yesterday.

Doctors at St Thomas's Hospital in south London are using the foetal fibronectin test - which is already used in the United States - to help detect which women are most at risk of going into premature labour.

Around 40,000 babies are born between the 24th and 37th week of pregnancy each year. Babies born before 28 weeks can face health problems later in life, such as cardiovascular disease, diabetes and hypertension. The cost of keeping such babies alive is also astronomical. It costs around £8,000 a week to keep a baby in a special baby unit and most children stay there for four to five weeks.

Foetal fibronectin is a protein which is found in the vagina of all pregnant women before 24 weeks of pregnancy. But it is not normally found from the 20th week of pregnancy until term. It acts as a "glue", sticking foetal and maternal membranes close together and if it starts to appear in the vagina (detectable by taking a swab), it may indicate future problems.

American doctors have found that the presence of the protein in the cervix or vagina after 20 weeks is an "extremely powerful predictor" of premature labour. If recognised in time, measures can be taken to try to prevent the women giving birth prematurely.

St Thomas's is currently offering the test to women at 24 and 27 weeks of their pregnancy. A quick swab is taken and the results are available after four days. If a woman is found to have fibronectin, she is offered special care at the hospital's new prematurity outpatient clinic.

The presence of fibronectin can also be a marker for bacterial vaginosis (BV), a bacterial infection resulting from a decrease in beneficial organisms such as lactobacilli, and a glut of others. BV is found in 20 per cent of women and St Thomas's carries out a separate test for it. If the result is positive, the infection can be treated with antibiotics and the risk of premature labour reduced significantly.

At the launch of National Pregnancy Week, Lucilla Poston, Professor of Foetal Health who is supervising the projects for Tommy's Campaign, the national baby charity to fund medical research, said that all pregnant women attending the hospital were being offered the test for BV, which was particularly useful for women with a history of problem pregnancies. They hoped 1,000 women would have taken part in the trial by the end of the year.

Professor Poston said that although the trial was in its early days, it had proved "strikingly successful".

In the US Professor Robert Goldenberg, of the University of Alabama, said that using the test had enabled them to diagnose who was suffering contractions leading to premature birth and who could safely be sent home. He said that the evidence linking BV to premature birth was "so strong, it really is a major public health problem", and that 14 separate studies had linked it to pre-term births.

At present the hospital's research is being funded by Tommy's Campaign but the charity aims to press the Department of Health to provide funding for the tests to be carried out nationwide at the end of the study.

Ultimately, they would be targeted at women with high-risk pregnancies, or those who may have suffered bleeding early on in their pregnancy.

This is the most advanced children's hospital in the land. It cost £17m to build. Yesterday its closure was mooted on the very day it opened

JOJO MOYES

An award-winning children's hospital, the first to be built in Britain this century, was opened yesterday – under the threat of closure from budget cuts.

The 77-bed Derbyshire Children's Hospital, which cost the National Health Service £15m to build, boasts an innovative approach to the welfare of its charges, and has already won at least one design award.

But even as it conducted its ceremonial opening yesterday, and took in its first ten patients, it has been hit by a funding crisis. Southern Derbyshire Health Authority is being forced to consider proposals to save £10m - and two of the four proposals recommend closing the hospital.

A public consultation document issued by Southern Derbyshire Health, Health Services in 2000 and Beyond, says that the two general hospitals in Derby, the Derbyshire Royal Infirmary and the Derby City General, are duplicating many services, while the funding system brought in by the Government means that the authority has "less money for new initiatives each year than we used to".

In the document's "Option 2", one of the two proposals which suggest that a single overarching hospital should replace the two general hospitals, a list of "disadvantages" states that the new Children's Hospital "would not be used" under that option.

The Derbyshire Children's Hospital took two years to build, has the most advanced paediatric equipment in the country, and should be able to treat 35,000 patients a year. Running costs have been estimated at £10m annually.

Wendy Dawe, business development manager at the new hospital, said that medical staff throughout the Derbyshire area had been very concerned by the prospect of closure since the consultation process began last December.

"It's very worrying," she said. "We are just hoping that people will look at what we've got and see that there's got to be a future for the children's hospital and the Derby City [hospital]." Ms Cope admitted that the services offered by the new hospital were "very similar" to those of other hospitals, but said that its innovative approach to the children's environment made the hospital unique.

"For years and years the guidance has been that children should be nursed in child-appropriate surroundings," she said. "The hospital was built based on research that showed children get better quicker [in a sympathetic environment]."

For that reason, the hospital was designed following consultation with children and parents, and features child-height reception desks and facilities to allow parents to stay over. "We talked [to schoolchildren], asking what would make the difference. They said children tend to look up at the ceiling or down at the floor so we have special murals and floor coverings around the hospital," she said.

"Everything on the walls is co-ordinated so that it breaks up the clinical look. And we have a fountain, because children said they found the water reassuring."

In the outpatients department, traditional rows of hard seating have been replaced by a "Loch Ness monster" with seating cushions for a spine. Wards are named "Ladybird", "Puffin" and "Snowflower". "Everything is very bright, very colourful.... Signs are done in pictures. There are lots of outdoor play areas. They're all things to take the edge off," Ms Dawe said.

She added that they had been able to make the hospital "so special" because £1.5m of the money used to fit out the hospital, on top of construction costs, had been generated by an appeal conducted by local people. "It's a community-built hospital," Ms Dawe said.

A spokeswoman for the health authority said yesterday: "Any closure would probably be more than 10 years ahead. And it's not definite that it's going to close - at the moment we're looking at all our hospital services."

Mushroom centenarians have a thoroughly rotten time

For a mycologist, even a yellowbrain fungus can be an object of great beauty. Esther Leach reports

It was humid and soggy underfoot, perfect conditions for a fungi foray. About a dozen members of the British Mycological Society were out on a wet Yorkshire hillside celebrating its centenary.

"We don't know what we are going to find, but the heavy rain should bring out some good examples," said Rita Cook, president of the North West Fungi Group.

She and others are spending the week rummaging around grassland and woods for mushrooms and toadstools and taking them back for analysis at Huddersfield University.

"You have to be careful how you dig them up, make sure you get the roots, I smell them and taste them to try to identify them."

"Picking them to eat is generally frowned upon because they are under threat by air pollution. Surveys are being carried out all the time to see how fungi are thriving."

The society is dedicated to the study of fungi and was founded in 1896 at a meeting in Selby, north Yorkshire. Today it enjoys international status.

"Fungi play an important part in clearing the debris in woodlands and countryside. It converts it into food for plants," added Ms Cooke.

"It's all quite fascinating. I think fungi are quite beautiful and some of them have very distinctive smells and tastes."

Superstition and myths surround fungi because one day they're here and the next they're gone," explained Ms Cooke.

"Take the yellow brain fungus for example. They look like small blobs of yellow jelly. People used to say they were the first aliens from outer space to land on earth because they were found where it was believed shooting stars fell. I think that's quite charming," added Ms Cooke.

"I could go on talking about fungi all day..."

Eat me Cantharellus cibarius (Chanterelle). The Latin name means "good to eat". Relatively common in this country, and much in demand for its vivid yellow colour and sweet taste. Chesteria alberti (Saint Paulin). Can be mistaken for footballs, and may grow to weigh up to 25kg. Tasty if picked young, sliced and cooked. Fluorula hepatica (Deadsteak Fungus). Found growing on the sides of trees. Eat raw or cooked. Has a slightly lemony taste.

Don't eat me Amatoxins (Death Cap). Common in south of England. Amanitin poisoning causes severe stomach upset, and subsequent liver and/or kidney dysfunction. Cordyceps speciosus. Causes Orellanine Syndrome with damage to liver, kidneys and spinal cord. Usually fatal. Found mainly in Scotland. Amanita muscaria (Fly's Mushroom). Quite rare. Reported to have a good taste. Symptoms of Amanitin poisoning last after eight hours.

Don't abuse me Gymnopilus juvencus. Relatively common species of psychoactive fungus which tastes bitter and can cause hallucinations. Psilocybe semilanceata (Liberty Cup). "Magic mushroom" can be picked and eaten raw without breaking the law, but processing to make the active ingredient psilocybin more potent could be illegal.

Policemen behaving badly put women off

Women wanting to join the police are frightened of joining the force due to a macho culture which sees female officers labelled as "dykes, bikes and burglars' dogs".

More than 500 female officers from 44 countries around the world attending the International Association of Women Police conference at Birmingham's International Convention Centre were told of a culture of underground sexism and men-only drinking dens.

Dr Malcolm Young, an anthropologist and former police officer, said anti-sexist measures in the force had only driven chauvinism underground. He claimed that senior officers in Britain regularly referred to police women as "burglars' dogs" and many believed they had no place in the force.

He told the audience, which included delegates from the British Association of Women Police, that some female CID officers were shown hard-core pornography by male detectives so they could "get used to the sort of things they will have to deal with".

He said: "I am a pessimist and the situation will only change if we have a 50/50 ratio of male and female officers. There is a culture of deeply entrenched beliefs that women are marginal."

"Sexism is now underground, normally taking place in the CID pub which is usually full of male officers swapping jokes about their female colleagues and using sexist humour."

"Women are invited to see hard-core pornography as part of their training in CID with the explanation that it will get them used to what they will have to face." Dr Young, who based his assertions on 11 years of research conducted while serving as a senior officer in the Merseyside and West Mercia forces, said: "The infrastructure is bound in concrete and an underground network has built up in CID pubs where sexist humour prevails."

Catherine Little, a law lecturer at Manchester Metro University, agreed that a macho culture was discouraging women from joining the police.

She said that the police force was based on a "militaristic model" and needed more emphasis on services. "There is a macho view of rough, tough police work which we see every week on The Bill, but we know that police work is not only about that."

"Masculine culture intrudes into the private lives of women officers such as speculation over whether she is a 'dyke or a bike'."

"There seems to be some reluctance to fully embrace equal opportunities policies in some forces. Often equal opportunities is the province of the personnel department and is run by civilian employees."

"The culture within the police force is such that there is sometimes a suspicion of civies and so equal opportunities takes a back seat."

And she warned: "Some officers still do not fully realise that certain language and behaviour is unacceptable to female officers. The force must be seen to be openly challenging this kind of locker room behaviour which still exists among some male officers. It is the responsibility of employers to ensure they avoid costly litigation."

Desire

By Sappho

It seems to me that man is equal to the gods, that is, whoever sits opposite you and, drawing nearer, savours, as you speak, the sweetness of your voice and the thrill of your laugh, which have so stirred the heart in my own breast, that whenever I catch sight of you, even if for a moment, then my voice deserts me and my tongue is struck silent, a delicate fire suddenly races under my skin, my eyes see nothing, my ears whistle like the whirling of a top and sweat pours down me and a trembling creeps over my whole body, I am greener than grass; at such times I seem to be no more than a step away from death,

but all can be endured since even a pauper...

Sappho, the most accomplished and lyrical of all classical women poets, lived in the city of Mytilene on Lesbos, around 600BC. Her poetry - most of it in fragments - is concerned almost exclusively with women, not only their emotional relationships, but life within the family, religious festivals and the struggles for power between aristocratic factions in Mytilene. Josephine Balmer translated and edited Sappho: Poems and Fragments for Bloodaxe (1992), and this year produced a companion volume Classical Women Poets (£7.95). It offers surprising and rare insights into the closed world of women in antiquity and is recommended.

JAMES CUSICK

A lead container found during excavations at Melrose Abbey in Scotland almost certainly holds the heart of King Robert the Bruce inside another lead casket, archaeologists confirmed yesterday.

With the world's press anxious for a simple heart-or-no-heart confirmation from the team of conservationists, yesterday's conclusion would not have impressed a Hollywood producer. After drilling tiny holes in the cylindrical lead container and inserting a fibre-optic cable to look inside, the team from Historic Scotland discovered a small second, cone-shaped casket. Inside they also found packaging paper and a small copper plaque from 1921. The plaque confirmed that in that year the cone-shaped container had been found in the floor of the abbey's chapter house "containing a heart". The casket was reburied.

Richard Welander from Historic Scotland said that absolute verification of the contents of the cone container as being the heart of the king of Scotland who had led his army to victory over the English at Bannockburn in 1314 "was not possible". However he added: "Although we cannot say with certainty this is Bruce's heart, we can say that it is reasonable to assume it is Bruce's heart." Such semantic precision will not worry the Scottish Tourist Board. If it can sell a monster in Loch Ness no one has seen, it can sell the homecoming of the heart of the Bruce.

'Absolute verification of the casket's contents is not possible'

What is inside the medieval cone-shaped casket will remain a mystery. There are no plans to delve further to analyse what

Moment of truth: Richard Welander and Mandy Clydesdale prepare to remove the cone supposedly containing the heart from the casket, which also held the copper plate dating from 1921 below

Life of the legend

■ His patience and determination are said to have been inspired by watching a spider spinning its web.
■ He was born in 1274 and crowned in 1306.
■ Viewed as a traitor by King Edward I, he was twice defeated in battle in 1306 and three of his brothers were executed.
■ His greatest triumph came in 1314 when an English army heading for Stirling was defeated outside the town at the Battle of Bannockburn.
■ The 1328 Treaty of Northampton recognised him as king - and Scotland's independence.
■ He died, possibly of leprosy, at Cardross, in 1329.
■ He was buried at Dunfermline but his heart was taken to the Crusades by James Douglas, knighted after Bannockburn.
■ Douglas died fighting the Moors in Spain, but his heart is said to have been buried at Melrose Abbey.

may be a mummified heart or a pile of dust. As was common when casket burials of parts of the famous took place in the 14th century - such as heads - the lead containers were dipped in pitch or tar to help prevent deterioration. From appearance it would seem the cone-shaped casket has survived remarkably well.

Crowned king in 1304, Bruce died in 1329 at Cardross, Dumfries, possibly of leprosy. He asked for his heart to be buried at Melrose because of his devotion to the abbey. He was buried at Dunfermline but in line with his orders his heart was taken to the Crusades by James Douglas, knighted after Bannockburn. Douglas died en route, fighting the Moors in Spain, but the heart, according to legend, was eventually buried at Melrose Abbey.

Although the excavations at Melrose may have solved one mystery, they have also considerably improved the knowledge of the Chapter House, effectively the business centre of the premier Cistercian home in Scotland at the time. The austere Benedictine order were influential theologians, wealthy and well respected in royal circles. With Scotland having no defined capital, the court moving to wherever the monarch spent the night, knowledge of the abbey's chapter house is regarded as important.

Doreen Grove, Inspector of Ancient Monuments for Historic Scotland, said: "Our understanding has been greatly improved by the excavations. The Bruce casket was just a by-product of our other work."

Although Bruce is reputed to have died of leprosy, DNA tests are being conducted on bone fragments excavated some years ago from Dunfermline to establish a possible cause of death.

A kinsman of Robert the Bruce is Conservative prospective parliamentary candidate for the Liberal Democrat-held seat of Fife North East. Adam Bruce, 28, a solicitor, claims kinship with Robert the Bruce, who had no male descendants, through the king's brother.

"The family has been very happy to see the huge interest there has been in the whole project," he said. "We are glad the casket will be reentered with due dignity. We hope all this will redress the balance after the unflattering picture that was painted of him in Braveheart, where he was depicted as grasping and ambitious and prepared to sell out."

Schools failing to give parents the true facts

JUDITH JUDD
Education Editor

Most school prospectuses and annual reports are flouting the law, according to a survey from the Consumers' Association published today.

Just one out of 80 primary and secondary schools contacted by the association sent a prospectus and governors' annual report for parents which met all the legal requirements. Headteachers said in response that the association would be better employed deciding how to cut back the excessive and bewildering amount of information that schools now had to give parents.

The survey says schools are missing out even the most basic information such as exam results, admissions policies and the type of school. Four schools provided no information in their prospectuses about GCSE and A-level results. A third of the secondary and half of the primary schools failed to give details of national test results. In addition, around 40 per cent of primary school governors' reports did not give test results and one in four secondary reports did not give absence rates. One report observed only two legal requirements.

Overall, 130 out of the 141 documents received did not comply with the law.

During the last decade, the Government has made regulations stating that schools must include information in their prospectuses and governors' annual reports about issues ranging from sex education and truancy to the destination of school leavers. These are summarised in the Parents' Charter.

Philip Cullum, the association's policy manager, said: "Our findings are extremely disappointing. There has been little sign of improvements since we conducted similar research three years ago - non compliance is widespread. Parents simply aren't being given enough information to help them choose their child's school and to hold the school's governors to some account. The best schools managed to sound welcoming but the worst almost implied that parents were an unavoidable inconvenience, rather than encouraging them to be more involved with their children's education."

Governors' reports had been required for 10 years, Mr Cullum added, but practice had not yet made them perfect.

Around half the reports failed to say when the next parent-governor elections were. Almost half the secondary school prospectuses did not include all the required information about admissions, and 12 did not even mention how parents could visit the school.

The association complains: "The presentation of the information varied greatly with almost illegible typeface in some instances. Educational jargon cropped up too often as did legalistic language."

David Hart, general secretary of the National Association of Head Teachers, said: "The vast majority of schools do their best to comply with the legal requirements."

"Omissions are accidental not deliberate. There is a grave danger that the amount of information schools are required to turn out will lead to a great big switch off among parents who need information in a more digestible form."

David Blunkett, the shadow Education Secretary, yesterday accused the Government of stealing Labour's plans for testing five-year-olds. He said government proposals to be announced today had been pioneered in Labour authorities such as Birmingham, Barnsley, Newcastle and Sheffield.

Faded cheerleader of the Tories tilts towards Labour

ANTHONY BEVINS
Political Editor
MARIANNE MACDONALD
Media Correspondent

A tilt towards Labour and more even-handed political coverage are being encouraged at the Daily Express, previously the most slavish supporter of the Tory cause. Yesterday sources said there had been a change in the "taste", or culture, of the paper's political coverage, giving Labour a much fairer crack of the whip over recent weeks.

One well-placed source said the paper was drawing attention to, and approving of, "the new, tough Blair". But an extra touch had been introduced by the new editor, Richard Addis: a more right-wing approach to the Conservatives, which means a more critical stance towards John Major. "That means that while Blair is being portrayed as the tough guy, Major has become the wimp," the source said.

Because of the secrecy surrounding the relationship between proprietors, or management, and editors of papers, it is difficult to pin down the cause of the change in the paper's stance.

Some insiders argue that while there is no question of it backing Labour at the election, Express readership has become too skewed towards Tory supporters. The latest MORI analysis, for April-June, suggests just over half of Express readers are Conservative, compared with 45 per cent for the Mail. More remarkably, the figures say, 38 per cent of Mail readers are Labour, compared to a third of Express readers.

Some Express executives have said they want the Labour proportion lifted. Whether that can be done by changing the tone of a paper's political coverage is an open question. It is also possible the reason is being given as an excuse for a politically motivated change by the new management following the merger between United News and Media with Lord Hollick's MAI in February.

At the time, analysts were sceptical that UNM's Lord Stevens, an out-and-out Conservative, would win a power struggle with the Labour peer. And so it has proved. In May, Lord Hollick appointed Stephen Grabiner, managing director of the Telegraph group, to the same position at the Express. His background is in marketing and accountancy, and his brief was to find ways of restructuring the Express and Sunday Express, whose circulation had plummeted since the 1970s. He called in Collinson Grant, a Manchester-based management consultancy, who are thought to have recommended that the two papers merge to form either a full, seven-day operation or a five-and-two-day operation.

Current speculation is that Sue Douglas, Sunday Express editor, will lose out in the power struggle, and that Mr Addis will be left in overall charge, with his even-handed approach to Labour.

That result could be guaranteed by reports that Lord Hollick will only agree to spend money on critical promotion of the papers if he is convinced the "product" is right.

Public bring century's top authors to book

Readers asked to nominate their top five books, writes David Lister

The reading public's nominations for the "best books written this century" are being sought in the biggest survey of its kind.

Waterstone's bookshops, in conjunction with Channel 4, yesterday launched the survey to find the 100 most popular books published since 1900. Ballot boxes are being placed in all 100 Waterstone's shops in the UK and Ireland.

Readers are asked to nominate five titles and to say in 50 words why one book, in particular, stands out above the rest. The survey is not only potentially larger than any previous effort, but, unusually, it includes all genres – not exclusively novels. So children's books, cookery books, science, history – even The Highway Code – can be nominated.

At the same time, Channel 4's

LITERARY EDITORS CHOICE

Book Choice is broadcasting 15 programmes in which authors and celebrities talk about their own favourite books of the century. In that series, Jackie Collins nominates Enid Blyton's The Magic Faraway Tree. Will Self chooses JG Ballard's Crash.

and Ruth Rendell pumps for Ford Madox Ford's The Good Soldier.

Martin Lee, marketing director of Waterstone's, said yesterday that the real attraction of the project was that it would reveal the public's choice for the first time. Previous lists of best books had largely been determined by literary critics, whose tastes were not necessarily the same as that of the public.

"We've been extremely anxious to find this out for some time," he said. "We really don't know what public taste genuinely is. There's a school of thought among our managers that this list will show that the books at the top of the list will be those that were on reading lists at school and had a formative influence on readers, books such as The Catcher in the Rye, Catch-22 and 1984."

Mr Lee added that the public was also free to nominate books outside the fiction category: "Road atlases and maps sell in large numbers in bookshops, but are not conventionally thought of as books." The results of the public vote will be announced next January.

Last year, the BBC's literary programme, Bookworm, asked viewers to telephone in with the name of the book they had enjoyed most in 1995. The winner was Birdsong, by Sebastian Faulks. A previous Mori poll on reading habits for that programme found 24 per cent of people regularly read non-fiction, with romances, enjoyed by 19 per cent, the most popular fiction choice.

SCREEN WATCH

Jones the Toad: Terry Jones is writer, director and star

The Wind in the Willows has never been made into a film – until now. The force behind the new project is former Monty Python man Terry Jones, who has adapted Kenneth Grahame's book, directs, and plays Mr Toad into the bargain.

Jones has assembled his friends, who are also some of the best British comic talent – John Cleese, Michael Palin, Steve Coogan, and, notably, Eric Idle, who gives a delightfully whimsical performance as Ratty. The film, which will be released in October, is disappointingly a little short on the magic of the original, but its indulgence in special effects and quick-fire humour may find a receptive children's audience.

Terry Jones himself speculates that the book has never been filmed before because it is "too placid and episodic". He adds that before he embarked on the film, he had never read the book. Now that's what I call a deprived childhood.

One of the first films to be partly financed by the National Lottery began shooting yesterday.

Downside, a co-production of the Newcastle-based Pilgrim Films, London-based Scala Productions and IMA Films of Paris, is directed by Bharat Nalluri and stars Paul McGann and Susan Lynch. Two lovers are trapped in the lift of a decaying tower block with a child and an elderly neighbour when the lift shaft catches fire. "So begins a nail-biting white-knuckle ride," the producers promise. It sounds rather like a Tyneside version of The Towering Inferno, though that movie, not depending on lottery money, didn't promise "an authentic portrayal of current social issues".

The shooting season evidently started in earnest yesterday. Also on location in the UK were Sir Ian McKellen and Kathy Bates in Beeban Kidron's new film Amy Foster, an adaptation of Joseph Conrad's short story. The director had her first major international success with the television adaptation of Oranges Are Not The Only Fruit.

The film charts the affair of a young servant girl and her immigrant lover, the sole survivor of a ship bound for America. It is the debut feature of Tapson Steel Films, and lacking any real exploration of current social issues, missed out on lottery finance.

Crisis in northern Iraq: Saddam's men slaughter Kurdish rivals as they pull back ■ Pressure mounts on West to take action

'Bloodbath' in Arbil in wake of Iraqi attack

JOHN LICHFIELD
DAVID USBORNE
New York
RICHARD LLOYD PARRY
Tokyo

Saddam Hussein's troops pulled back from the city of Arbil yesterday, leaving their new-found Kurdish allies in control and, according to one account, carrying out mass killings of rival Kurds in the streets.

Turkey and other governments welcomed the withdrawal as the beginning of a resolution of the crisis in northern Iraq. But other sources said Iraqi forces remained just outside the city and in de facto control.

The Foreign Secretary, Malcolm Rifkind, suggested a continued Iraqi military presence near Arbil would invite a Western response "sooner rather than later". A withdrawal was insignificant unless the troops moved at least 50 miles away.

Baghdad had earlier announced the removal of its troops, who captured Arbil at the weekend in a two-day combined assault with their former enemies in the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP). But the rival Kurdish faction, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK), insisted the Iraqi soldiers were still present and massacring its members.

The PUK spokesman said: "Iraqi troops have committed mass executions in Arbil of PUK members - some of them have been executed in the streets. A few hundred have been killed. Many hundreds have been arrested."

As Western governments considered their response, doubts remained about the precise status of Arbil under the terms of the "safe haven" for Kurds declared after the Gulf war in 1991. The city was not in a zone placed off-limits to Iraqi troops by Western governments following a resolution by the United Nations Security Council. But US officials said it was within a "no-fly zone" declared later and insisted the spirit of UN resolutions protecting the Kurds should apply.

Fighting between the Kurdish factions, rivals who have shifted alliances between Iraq and Iran, ignited in mid-August despite US efforts to broker a ceasefire. The KDP, under Masoud Barzani, looked to President Saddam after the PUK reportedly gained backing from Iran. The PUK leader, Jalal Talabani, has said Iraqi Kurdistan could split into pro-Iraq and pro-Iran regions if Washington and its allies do not respond.

Efforts to convene a session of the UN Security Council were bogged down yesterday as diplomats struggled to assess whether there had been any explicit violation of UN resolutions. Doubts were being expressed privately as to whether there would be enough support in the Council for serious UN action against Iraq beyond the usual words of condemnation. Russia and China, both permanent Council members, would be likely to oppose any military response, sources said.

The focus of attention at the UN is Resolution 688, which calls on Iraq to end all repression of its Kurdish minorities and to respect their human rights. It was on the back of this resolution that the US and its allies established a "safe haven" north of the 36th parallel.

The allies may argue that Baghdad has already violated Resolution 688 by its actions at the weekend. In theory, any "material breach" of the UN resolutions could open Iraq to reprisals, up to and including military action.

But the case is weakened by the vagueness of Resolution 688, which does little to define what would constitute repression by Baghdad. Still more discouraging for the Americans is the likely resistance of some in the Security Council, notably Russia, which has already called for restraint. "If they (the US) do take military action, it is more likely that they would do so on their own and come here for the approval of the Security Council after its all over," one diplomat suggested.

Speaking in Tokyo after meeting his Japanese opposite number, Mr Rifkind hinted that the Government was in favour of some punitive response to the Iraqi assault. "We know perfectly well that his [President Saddam's] objective is to use any opportunity that presents itself to establish control over the Kurdish areas ... His initial objective has to be to regain what he lost as a result of the Gulf War ... He will be in a stronger position to contemplate aggression against other countries if he has control over the whole of Iraq itself."

British sources said President Saddam's posture since the Gulf war had been to push the international community whenever possible and see how far he got. If not stopped now, he would push further and further.

Short rations: The scene in a market in central Baghdad yesterday where the news of the UN delaying the food-for-oil deal has seen a sharp rise in food prices

Tehran blames US for fighting

SAFA HAERI

Iran has accused the United States of "aiding with Iraq" in the "killing and suffering" of the Kurdish population of Iraq.

In a commentary which reflects the views of the Iranian clerical authorities, Tehran Radio said both Washington and Baghdad have "common interests" in the suppression of the Iraqi Kurdish populations.

The station said: "The clashes in northern Iraq are not the fruits of Iran's intervention but those of Washington's secret attempts to block Iran's diplomatic effort in northern Iraq." It said that Saddam Hussein's military intervention in the American protected zone north of the 36th parallel was carried out with the "full knowledge" of the US. "That explains why it took the White House three full days before they gave Baghdad a warning; and anyway, Saddam had stated from the outset that he would not remain long in the area," it added.

What makes the situation in the protected zone more complicated for US policy-makers is that the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK), which is backed by Tehran against the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), also enjoys Washington's favour.

Tehran last month took advantage of the fighting, which has left more than 2,000 dead, by bombarding strongholds of the Democratic Party of Iranian Kurdistan (DPK) inside the protected zone.

To add to the confusion, Iranian leaders have also created their own Kurdish parties in Iraqi Kurdistan, including the Kurdish Hizbollah.

The radio commentary concluded: "From the beginning [of the fight between the two Kurdish factions] Iran started an all-out humanitarian effort to end the bloodshed and ... was able to establish a fragile peace. But Washington's untimely reaction to that success ... led the White House to renew the fighting and encourage Saddam into new ventures."

Bemused Clinton pressed to act

RUPERT CORNWELL
Washington

President Bill Clinton's senior foreign-policy advisers buddled in the White House yesterday to decide a response to Saddam Hussein's latest aggression as pressure mounted on the US and the Western allies to punish him for his incursion at the weekend into the Kurdish "safe zone" in northern Iraq.

Last night there was still no firm pointer whether Washington would opt for a military or a diplomatic reprisal - or a combination of both - but calls are multiplying that without stern action, allied credibility in the region would be severely dented. Nor was it clear whether the Iraqi dictator had pulled his forces back from Arbil to south of the 36th parallel.

US officials believe some pull-back is taking place but, as always, are sceptical of any pledge from Baghdad; in the words of one, "it appears to be a redeployment rather than a withdrawal". US forces in the region, more than 200 aircraft and 23,000 men, remain on high alert. Four B-52 bombers have been repositioned in Guam for possible use against Iraq and troops and aircraft in the US are on standby.

Washington's war of words continues, in the same vein as in previous comparable skirmishes with President Saddam since his defeat in the 1991 Gulf war. The challenge would not go unanswered: "Because he's prone to miscalculation," Mike McCurry, the White House spokesman, said yesterday, "that might lead him to believe he can do other things that are clearly unacceptable."

But several factors complicate the issue. One is the problem of devising a satisfactory military response. The dispatch of ground troops is unlikely, experts say, because of the remote and difficult terrain in the region, while the use of air power against Iraqi armoured units could cause casualties to the Kurdish civilian population.

The Clinton administration must also weigh the impact of the new Islamic-led government of Turkey, as well as the fact that the region's Kurds are split between pro-Iraqi and pro-Iranian factions.

Against that, however, it must guard against any hint of irresolution against Saddam being exploited by the Republican presidential candidate, Bob Dole.

Indeed, Mr Dole said at a weekend election meeting that President Saddam "has been testing American leadership and finding it weak". He accused the administration of "delegating the problem to low-level officials" whose "inaudible warnings" had naturally been ignored by Iraq. To which Mr McCurry retorted that it was time for the country to speak "with one common voice".

Some analysts here argue that whatever punishment he incurs, President Saddam has already scored a points win in his latest confrontation with the West. He has shown he is still a force in his own backyard and succeeded in preventing the formation of a united Kurdish movement in Iraq, which had been a prime diplomatic objective of the US.

The dilemma was summed up by a New York Times editorial yesterday. The US "rightly" opposed the permanent partition of Iraq or the creation of an independent Kurdish state. But it was dealing with an irrational adversary. Faced with Washington's threats, "a minimally responsible Iraqi leader would back off to spare his people unnecessary further suffering". But Saddam had failed that test in the past "and may do so again".

Europe Editor

Ukraine launched a new currency, the hryvna, yesterday in an effort to consolidate national independence and demonstrate the government's commitment to sound economic policies. The hryvna replaces the karbovanets, a temporary coupon that was introduced in 1992, shortly after Ukraine gained independence amid the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Many exchange offices in Kiev failed to open on time yesterday morning because they had no new banknotes to distribute. Many stores were also closed because shopkeepers did not have enough new money to give out as change.

Nevertheless the hryvna's appearance marks an important step forward in Ukraine's progress to full-fledged statehood. Another milestone was passed last June when parliament adopted a new constitution, replacing an amended version of the 1978 Soviet constitution that had been in force since Ukraine's declaration of independence in August 1991.

In a gesture of Western support for Ukraine, Chancel-for Helmut Kohl of Germany arrived in Kiev yesterday for talks with President Leonid Kuchma and his Prime Minister, Pavlo Lazarenko. John Major visited Kiev last April and expressed strong support for Ukraine's independence.

The hryvna bears the same name as a currency that circulated in 1918 during Ukraine's first experiment in independence after the fall of the Tsars. Hryvna is an Old Church Slavonic term for money.

The brief life of the karbovanets, which replaced the former Soviet rouble, coincided with a period of extraordinary economic instability in Ukraine. Annual inflation soared to 10,000 per cent in 1993, industrial output slumped, and Ukraine fell behind Russia in developing financial markets and privatising state enterprises.

Yet the picture has improved over the past year. The karbovanets has held steady against the dollar since December, and inflation fell to a monthly rate of 0.1 per cent in June and July. Ukrainians have two weeks to exchange their old money for new, with the rate fixed at 100,000 karbovanetsi for one hryvna. Mr Lazarenko's government is initially setting the hryvna at 1.75 to the dollar, but may emulate Russia in creating a flexible "corridor" exchange rate. This permits a gradual decline in the currency's notional value, within limits determined by the government's anti-inflationary policies. The strategy has proved a success in Russia since the rouble was placed in a "corridor" trading range against the dollar in July 1995.

Speaking on national television before the currency reform, Mr Lazarenko urged Ukrainians not to be tricked by money-changers into swapping their currencies at an unfair rate. "There is no need to play into the pockets of commercial banks and commercial structures with your rash actions. They seek to make additional profits from everything the government does," he said.

The hryvna's introduction was made possible by help from the International Monetary Fund, which arranged a $867m (£560m) stand-by credit last April in return for a government commitment to introduce market reforms. Ukraine is hoping for a $1.5bn stabilisation fund from the IMF to strengthen the new currency.

INDEPENDENT ON SUNDAY

If laughter really is the best medicine, then The Independent and the Independent on Sunday are about to improve your health dramatically. In conjunction with Laughing Stock, we are giving you the chance to buy up to 20 audio comedy cassettes on a 'two for the price of one' basis. Two double cassettes cost £8.99, two single cassettes £6.99, or choose one of each for just £7.99. All prices include postage and packing.

Our list includes some of the country's top comedians from Paul Merton, Eddie Izzard and Jo Brand, to timeless classics such as Tony Hancock and Peter Cook. So next time you're sitting in rush hour traffic, say goodbye to road rage and have a good laugh instead.

How to Apply
To obtain your two audio comedy cassettes for the price of one, collect three differently numbered tokens from the seven we are publishing in The Independent and the Independent on Sunday. Today we are printing Token 4. Tokens 5 will be printed in tomorrow's Independent. Send your tokens, together with a completed order form and cheque, to the address below. An order form is printed below and will be printed again on Friday 6 September. With your three tokens you can order as many cassettes as you wish in multiples of two. Photocopies of tokens and order forms are not acceptable. Please allow 28 days for delivery from the date of your order. No responsibility will be accepted for delays caused by industrial action within the postal service. Orders must be received by 30 September 1996. Cassettes are subject to availability. Tehran blames US for fighting

SAFA HAERI

Iran has accused the United States of "deliberate provocation" in the "killing and kidnapping" of its citizens. In a statement, the Islamic Republic said the US was "responsible for the deaths of the 14 Iranian citizens" in the Baghdad bombings. The statement also accused the US of "deliberate provocation" in the "killing and kidnapping" of its citizens.

Labor Day gets race under way

RUPERT CORNWELL
Washington

For the United States, it is the bitter-sweet holiday which bids a wistful goodbye to summer. But every four years, for the presidential candidates and their running mates, and the small army of reporters who will accompany them for the next two months, it is the kick-off for the most gruelling election campaign yet devised by man.

Yesterday, both President Bill Clinton and his Republican challenger, Bob Dole, obeyed the Labor Day tradition: the incumbent on the hustings in the key industrial state of Wisconsin, his opponent at a rally in St Louis at the 600th high arch on the banks of the Mississippi river, symbolic gateway to the West and (Mr Dole fervently hopes) gateway to the swing state of Missouri and to final victory on 5 November.

For both men it is the last election, hard though that may be to believe of that compulsive and hugely gifted campaigner Bill Clinton, at the tender political age of 50. As for Mr Dole, at the age of 73 he has, in his own words, "nowhere to go but the White House, or home".

And it is to the latter that the Republican presently looks to be heading. Mr Clinton starts with all the high cards, and every precedent argues for his re-election. For one thing, incumbents who avoid a serious challenge in the primaries invariably win. So do those presiding over an economy growing - as did the US's in the second quarter - at 4.8 per cent a year.

Polls since last week's convention in Chicago put his lead back at 15 to 20 per cent, virtually cradling whatever "bounce" Mr Dole took with him from San Diego a fortnight ago. Never in modern American history has such a deficit at Labor Day been reversed in the following two months.

Admittedly, Gerald Ford in 1976 and Hubert Humphrey in 1968 came close after emerging from their respective conventions far behind. But both failed. And even in the most legendary comeback of them all, Harry Truman's against Thomas Dewey in 1948, the largest measured lead of the Republican was 13 per cent. And Truman was an incumbent president.

To turn history on its head, the conventional wisdom says, Mr Dole must have some help from outside - a Wall Street crash (unlikely), a foreign policy calamity (Iraq thus far is not measuring up), or a scandal that engulfs Mr Clinton (despite Whitewater and Dick Morris, nothing in prospect of the scale required).

In terms of regions, and the individual states whose electoral college votes formally determine the winner, Mr Clinton's position looks equally unassailable. On both coasts he is far ahead. In the East, he is poised to carry every state from Maine to Maryland, with the possible exception of New Hampshire. On the other side, Washington, Oregon and above all California, whose 54 electoral votes are on their own one-fifth of the 270 needed to win, look solid.

Mr Dole can count on most of the South, although Mr Clinton should win in at least his native Arkansas, perhaps Tennessee, and is competitive in Florida which no Republican can afford to lose. Almost certainly, Mr Dole will carry the central tier of Plains states, north and south of his native Kansas, as well as most of the Rocky Mountain states.

And if the race does become close, it will be decided in the arc of old industrial states from Wisconsin through Illinois, Ohio and Michigan to Pennsylvania - in every one of which the President now enjoys a handsome lead. If the election were held tomorrow, one study says, he would win an electoral college landslide of 409 to 126.

The presence, too, of the independent Ross Perot works to Mr Clinton's advantage. The Texas billionaire has yet to find a vice-presidential candidate for the Reform Party ticket, and his first 30-minute television "commercial" this weekend went by almost unnoticed. But even if he wins half or less of the 19 per cent he took in 1992, the bulk of those votes are expected to be at Mr Dole's expense.

Mr Perot's strongest issue is the deficit, and in Sunday's broadcast, he took direct aim at Mr Dole's promise of a 15 per cent across-the-board tax cut, describing it as a re-run of the supply-side "voodoo economics" of the Reagan era, which had helped run up the national debt to $5,000bn (£3,300bn).

Small wonder the Dole camp is desperately trying to keep Mr Perot out of the three presidential debates this autumn, the first of them in St Louis on 25 September, and that Mr Clinton's aides are trying equally hard to have him take part.

Home-town heroes bring the politics closer

★ TEXAS TALES

Elaine Davenport charts her state's progress during the run-up to the US elections

When I vote on 5 November in the small gymnasium of the local elementary school in my neighbourhood in Austin, Texas, my ballot will start with a choice between Bill Clinton and Bob Dole for United States president. That race - for the top position in the most powerful country in the world - will get most of the headlines here and abroad and is, I admit, relatively important.

But no matter what happens during the next eight weeks in the presidential race, all politics are essentially local and by far the juiciest fights will have taken place much further down the ballot. The winners of the other contests will be making decisions that affect my life, and the lives of the nearly 1 million of us living in the Austin area.

Ballots in Travis County will have contested races for three Texas Supreme Court positions, three Court of Criminal Appeals places and three seats in the state legislature. Also up for grabs are sheriff, district attorney, district judge, tax assessor-collector, a seat on the state Railroad Commission and one on the Board of Education.

So far the Texas race that has captured the most attention for US senators. Both our current senators are Republicans. The term of Kay Bailey Hutchison, the former university cheerleader turned conservative politician, is not up this year. But Phil Gramm, who ran for the Republican nomination for president earlier this year and pulled out when most voters around the country chose Mr Dole, is fending off a storybook challenge from Victor Morales.

Mr Morales is not a politician

Battle ground: Like voters everywhere, those in Austin, the second largest state capital in the US, are influenced by local issues but a government high school teacher from Crandall in south Texas. He won the Democratic nomination by driving all over Texas in his pick-up truck, shaking hands and listening to people. The technique is reminiscent of Texas's best-known politician, Lyndon B Johnson, also a Democrat, who became president when John F Kennedy was assassinated in 1963. Farmers in the hill country where LBJ was born and first campaigned remember him driving full tilt along country roads, leaping out of his vehicle and striding across their fields to shake hands and talk a spell.

The technique must still work for Mr Morales, upset two incumbent Democratic congressmen for the November ballot spot. His candidacy is inspiring unusual passions. One Anastine I know who is best described as a proper little old lady did volunteer work for Mr Morales and claims to have got drunk and danced all night when he won the primary. Her friends were astounded; she says she liked Mr Morales' smile.

His ancestry appeals to the state's Mexican Americans who will be in the majority in less than a generation and who are still under-represented politically. His pick-up truck appeals to the rural, conservative, white male voter. His underdog candidacy appeals to voters who are tired of life-long politicians. His lack of funds - he began on $8,000 (£5,300) of his $10,000 life savings - is in dramatic proportion to Mr Gramm's $83.5m. Mr Gramm is well known for accepting special interest money; Mr Morales is famous for accepting $15 at a time to fill his petrol tank and get him to his next stop.

Not so long ago Austin would have been solid Morales country. The state capital and home of the University of Texas was rightly considered by the rest of the state to be a bastion of liberalism. But that is changing, as massive population growth in the area brings in more middle-class, white conservative voters. Today the odds are about even that a Republican will win.

Yet voters in Austin - or anywhere in the US - are looking for candidates who seem to think like they do on local questions such as clean water and air, bus services, how Texas will interpret new federal immigration and welfare reform rules, whether to allow convicted sex offenders who have served their time back into the community, affirmative action, whether to endorse English as the official language or how to deal with increasing rate of juvenile crime.

The passion that local issues can evoke is seen in the race for district attorney. Democratic incumbent Ronnie Earle, has incensed some of the African-American community by obtaining the conviction of a 12-year-old poor black girl for "injury to a child" in the death of a two-year-old who was in her care. Mr Earle is accused of playing politics with the case. Help with the girl's appeal is being organised.

The Democratic lesbian lawyer running for Travis county sheriff is also unlikely to go unnoticed. No doubt we will hear more about her and others in the coming weeks.

The writer André Malraux will be reburied in the Pantheon, Paris, next to Voltaire, Rousseau and Victor Hugo, the French government said. His remains will be transferred on 23 November in a special honours ceremony, according to the Cultural Affairs Minister, Philippe Douste-Blazy. Malraux's best-known works are La Condition Humaine, about China in the 1920s, and L'Espoir, about the civil war in Spain, in which he fought on the Republican side. Malraux also travelled extensively in the Far East, and narrowly escaped a German firing squad as a fighter in the Resistance during the Second World War. Where the Stars and Stripes only flutters to deceive

MIAMI DAYS

The United States has been suffocating. Not through the heat, which has been remarkably benign in most areas, but the God-bless-America patriotism. The Olympics were bad enough, but what did it was the party conventions. The Stars and Stripes ties, shirts, sequined waistcoats the delegates wore: the speeches about the American Dream, about America the greatest country in the history of the "human species, America "the last best hope for mankind", and so on.

Desperate for a breather, I flew south to spend a couple of days in Miami. Now, yes, of course, it does say on the map that Miami is a part of the US. But it actually isn't. It's the capital of Latin America.

Don't be fooled by the sight of the enormous US flags that flutter alongside the highway leading out of the airport into town. It's all show. A pretence the natives put on to pacify visitors from the north, whom they commonly refer to as "stupid gringos". Look at the street signs and you'll read names like Granada, Sevilla, Ponce de Leon. Turn on the radio and see if you can find any variations on the salsa theme. The closest you get is Gloria Estefan singing English lyrics to a Latin beat. In Miami, the lingua franca is Spanish. The staff at hotels and restaurants speak just enough English to accommodate the needs of tourists - just as in Mexico. But try to explain to a bellboy that the plumbing doesn't work, or ask for your waiter to expand on the ingredients in "tonight's specials", and you'll get dumb stares.

The people who run the city, from the mayor down, are Cubans. The Miami Herald has a Spanish supplement called El Nuevo Herald which is faster than the rest of the newspaper. The other Miami newspaper, published in Spanish, is called El Diario de las Americas.

I was told by a friend I had last seen on a previous trip to Miami eight years ago that the Hispanic stranglehold had tightened in the intervening years. The number of people who speak Spanish at home had risen to more than a million, or nearly 60 per cent of the population. And unlike Los Angeles, or other border cities where Hispanics live in great numbers, those on the top economic rung are Spanish-speakers. Which reminded me of a high society party I attended in Miami on my earlier visit. I remember thinking that if you were of European descent and would like to have a flavour of what it was like to be black in Potgietersrus, Northern Transvaal, under apartheid, this was the place to be. It wasn't that I was scorned or snuffed at. It was worse. It was as if I wasn't there.

I caught a glimpse of the local aristocracy last week as I was checking in at my hotel. Behind me in the spacious lobby, an olive-skinned girl in her teens was posing for a photographer alongside a pillar and a vast bouquet of flowers. She was wearing a long, off-the-shoulder sari gown - a wedding dress in pink. But she was too young to be getting married. Too young to be assuming a demeanour so haughty for the camera.

I'd never seen this anywhere else in the US, but I knew, having lived most of the Eighties in Latin America, that the girl was celebrating her 15th birthday. Evidently, somewhere else in the hotel, a big party was being held in her honour.

In Latin American countries it is a very big deal when a girl reaches 15. Parents will go to great lengths to make sure they mark this female variation on the bar mitzvah in appropriately splendid style. I once attended such an event in Mexico. The family were poor but they were hosting a banquet fit for a pauper. Someone explained to me that the father had, as the Mexicans say, gone, "throwing the house out of the window". Which meant that he had spent every last penny he had to convey the required impression of affluence and paternal devotion.

It's this kind of attitude towards money that makes countries such as Mexico great in spirit, but bankrupt - congenitally incapable, it would seem, of the thrift on which the wealth of its mighty northern neighbour is built. However, once those same people come to the US, it appears that they sober up and start behaving according to local rules. Otherwise how to explain the opulence of Miami?

How, for that matter, to explain a giant electronic screen on Highway 95 ("la Noventa y Cinco") advertising holidays in Alaska? It could only have meant one thing. Alaska is an even better place than Miami to escape the claustrophobia of American campaign politics, two months of which we shall be obliged to endure between now and 5 November.

Autocar said the new Mercedes C-class Estate has the handling characteristics of a sporting saloon. Our photograph shows why.

It not only has more room at the back than any other car in its class.

It also has our unique 5-point multi-link suspension, which gives it remarkable road-holding and gives you remarkable control. At the front, its suspension is double wishbone.

You'll find the same system on Formula One cars but on precious few estate cars. It's expensive, but it's also responsive.

That gives you an idea of the way the new C-class Estate performs as a car.

How does it perform as an estate? It has a maximum 53 cubic feet of luggage space.

Middle East accord: Israel rejects Arafat's call for international arbitration as negotiators fail to agree over summit

PLO leader seeks help to revive peace talks

YAFFA AMR
Reuters

Jerusalem — Yasser Arafat said yesterday that he might seek international arbitration to keep the peace process with Israel alive.

The suggestion came after Israeli and Palestine Liberation Organisation negotiators again failed to reach agreement on resuming full peace talks, or on arranging a first summit between Mr Arafat and the Israeli Prime Minister, Benjamin Netanyahu.

Asked about the Palestinian president's comments, a spokesman for Mr Netanyahu rejected arbitration and said the Palestinian leader was trying to ensure Israel as negotiators sought a formula for resuming full-fledged peace talks.

"We are committed to the peace process and we are seeking through all means to maintain and protect it and in case of difficulties, we are going to seek arbitration," Mr Arafat said. David Bar-Ilan, Netanyahu's director of communications, said in response: "We are not going to anything like arbitration."

Mr Bar-Ilan added that arbitration ran against the spirit of the 1991 Middle East peace conference that sanctioned direct peace talks between the parties. "I think it is a traditional tactic to pull this kind of thing at the very last minute before an agreement is reached," he said.

"I hope the very plain goal of the negotiations in the past few weeks, namely the achievement of an agreed upon agenda, will be achieved without any serious hitches and that the subsequent meeting between Prime Minister Netanyahu and Arafat will take place," he added.

One PLO official said the Palestinians were seeking a clear commitment from Mr Netanyahu to implement all outstanding issues in Israeli-PLO peace deals, such as Israeli troop redeployment from Hebron and other parts of the West Bank.

Israel, he said, proposed to divert to committees for further negotiation issues already agreed in past pacts signed by previous Labour governments. "We asked for reassurances this [Likud] government would honour the agreements, implement them and not seek to fragment them," the official said.

Egypt gave Israel three weeks to start implementing the peace deals or face cancellation of a Middle East economic conference planned for Cairo in November. The Egyptian Ambassador to Israel, Mohammed Bassiouny, said: "The Egyptian government has given the Israeli government three weeks to start implementing five points Israel was committed to and did not implement. Otherwise the economic conference will not be held."

The five points that Israel must implement are redeployment from Hebron, further redeployments from the West Bank, opening safe passages between Gaza and the West Bank, release of all women prisoners and lifting the closure completely," Mr Bassiouny said.

Indonesia democracy activists 'missing'

RICHARD LLOYD PARRY

Five weeks after thousands of Indonesians rioted in support of the democracy leader, Megawati Sukarnoputri, a report by the government-sponsored National Commission for Human Rights says that at least 74 people are still unaccounted for.

Five people were killed in the riots, according to the commission, after police raided the headquarters of the Indonesian Democratic Party (PDI), and evicted supporters of Ms Megawati, its deposed leader. General Syarwan Hamid, chief of the army's socio-political affairs unit, yesterday rejected the report. The official number of fatalities acknowledged by the military is four. General Hamid was quoted as saying that reports of large numbers of missing people, feared killed at the hands of police and the military, were not to be taken seriously. "The missing people have simply not returned home. That's all," he told the Republika newspaper.

The Indonesian armed forces have been accused in the past of engineering the "disappearances" of political opponents, most recently in East Timor where some 200 civilians vanished after troops fired on mourners at a funeral in 1991.

Members of the Commission for Human Rights, independent monitors, and journalists investigating the aftermath of the riots have been hampered by contradictory accounts of the numbers of missing and wounded, lack of co-operation by the authorities, and fear of retribution among witnesses.

The Independent has spoken to two men who claimed to have witnessed killings of Megawati supporters during the raid on the party headquarters. They were allegedly carried out by men dressed as supporters of a rival faction in the PDI, but suspected of being disguised members of the armed forces.

According to the first witness, a 30-year-old student, he was standing guard outside the PDI headquarters when several trucks arrived carrying the alleged supporters of the rival faction shortly after 6am on 27 July. They produced bayonets and handguns fitted with silencers and began shooting and stabbing PDI supporters sleeping on a grass verge in front of the headquarters. Fire hoses were used to rinse down the road.

The second witness was inside the PDI headquarters when the alleged faction supporters forced their way in. He claims to have seen them stabbing and shooting as many as 40 people with bayonets and silenced firearms. The bodies were loaded into a truck and the area was hosed down.

Similar accounts were gathered by an Amnesty International researcher who returned from Indonesia last week, but none of the witnesses was prepared to talk to the Commission.

Gallery pursues costly hoaxer

Copenhagen — In a reversal of usual employment practices, a museum dismissed Anna Castberg and then demanded proof that she was qualified for a job she no longer had.

Ms Castberg, a Danish-born British citizen, was hired as director of Copenhagen's Arken Museum of Modern Art based on her impressive qualifications. After three years, they have come back to haunt her and the museum, the B.T. newspaper reported yesterday.

Last month, the mysterious, glamorous woman — newspapers say she reminds them of Meryl Streep — was dismissed by Copenhagen County, which claimed she was a poor manager. The county gave her 600,000 kroner (about £65,000) in severance pay.

Now the museum board wants proof of her claims that she was educated at the Sorbonne and the Courtauld Institute of Art in London, was a columnist for the Paris-based newspaper the International Herald Tribune in 1970s, and worked at two Czech museums, as she claimed.

None of those places had ever heard of her, said Danish newspapers, which have been investigating her past since her dismissal on 20 August.

The mystery deepened when Ms Castberg, 48, vanished, saying that she would collect proof of her claims. Newspapers cannot find her and her lawyer, Per Magid, said he no longer represented her.

If she returns, the museum and county may sue unless she proves she was worthy of the job and the "golden handshake". Asked if it was not better to check credentials before hiring, rather than after firing, Copenhagen County's Henning Thomsen said that employment had to be based on trust.

But the B.T. tabloid said Ms Castberg was so "beautiful, charming and intelligent" that the male-dominated hiring committee might have not have been looking at her résumé.

Dom Adam Kehrle

The name of Brother Adam is well known in all bee-keeping circles. The small market trader selling his honey on a stall in a French provincial town or in the big commercial apary in the southern United States selling thousands of queen honey bees all over the world will be just as familiar with his work as the academic centres of every continent.

Born Karl Kehrle in south Germany, in 1910, as a boy of 11, he was sent from his home to join the order of Benedictine monks at St Mary's Abbey, Buckfast, in South Devon. Here he was initially named Louis.

Ill-health prompted his move from building work as a stone mason to a lifetime's involvement with the abbey aparies; the development of the bee-keeping enterprise at Buckfast Abbey was both his brainchild and the endeavours of his physical hard work against a backdrop of monastic life.

In 1915 he began his work with the bees, which he took over full responsibility for in 1919. The disastrous so-called Isle of Wight epidemic which caused the wholesale loss of honey bees in the British Isles at the outbreak of the First World War was to shape the breeding programme that Kehrle was to follow. Only 16 colonies out of 45 survived at the Abbey aparies and these, a cross between Italian and British Blacks or Carniolan and British Blacks, produced his original breeding stock.

In 1920, he obtained a copy of the paper "The Art of Bee Breeding", by Professor L. Armbruster, which set out a theoretical approach to the breeding of honey bees with regard to the laws of the geneticist Gregor Mendel.

Kehrle's goal was clear. He wanted to create a cross-breed of bees with resistance to disease (especially scab), that were very gentle to handle, that swarmed rarely and were abundant honey producers. He set up an isolation mating station at Shebton in the middle of Dartmoor in 1925 where the harsh climatic weather conditions were a test for any honey bee and did not allow wild stock to survive which would create mis-matings.

In 1930 Kehrle resited the home apary and commenced work on the reorganisation of the honey department, rebuilding the honey extracting plant. When he fell ill two years later and returned home to Germany, it was the first time since he had left home aged 11 - 22 years earlier.

For the next 20 years Kehrle bred with the stocks he had created, selling queens and setting up Buckfast bee production as a commercial activity.

His extremely important study and collection of bee breeding material from Europe and the countries bordering the Mediterranean (both north and south) began in 1950 when shortage of transport and fuel were still very difficult after the Second World War.

He travelled over 82,000 miles by road in his search for desirable bees (plus 7,800 miles by sea - and many more by air): for example to France, Switzerland, Austria, Italy, Sicily, North Africa, Algeria, Israel, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, Cyprus, Greece, Yugoslavia, and the Aegean Islands in 1952. This work continued over many years penetrating into the Sahara Desert itself. It culminated in a trip to Mount Kilimanjaro, East Africa, in search of the black honey bee Apis mellifera mombasa when he was 89. (The Cretan bee is named Apis mellifera adami.)

The result of this work was the distinctive tan-coloured Buckfast bee - gentle, disease-resistant and honey-producing. It is much sought-after today, and is still produced commercially on both sides of the Atlantic.

Kehrle's teachings and methods as a practical beekeeper are unsurpassed, and his books, In Search of the Best Strains of Bees, Breeding the Honeybee, and Bee Keeping at Buckfast Abbey, first published in 1975, are still relevant today.

Indeed, as early as 1929 his accomplishments were publicly praised in the British Bee Journal of that year: "Like the bees he never appears to sleep in summer with apary work, invention and experimentation. He is one of nature's silent workers and the most competent one in Britain."

Ten years later, he was invited to serve on the Ministry of Agriculture Advisory Committee on apiculture, attending quarterly meetings at Rothamsted up until the 1970s, which inevitably brought him into contact with leading beekeepers in Europe.

Not only did Kehrle break new ground in the assessment of different races of bees and bee breeding, but he was com-mercially successful throughout the world. It was just reward therefore that his efforts should be recognised with his appointment as OBE in the Queen's Birthday Honours List of 1974. Similarly, he was awarded the Verdienstkreuz in Germany the following year for services to beekeeping.

He was awarded an Honorary DSc from the University of Uppsala in Sweden in 1987 and an honorary BSc from Exeter University in 1989.

In the words of Frederick Ruttner: "Brother Adam's life-long work has contributed substantially to the improvement of the management and stocks of honey bees. This contribution to apicultural research, which in turn has had its impact on honey bee breeding, has yet to be fully recognised."

His love of bees was evident to all who knew him, both in his achievements and his daily life.

Roger Banks-Pye

"Roger Banks-Pye is the most innovative talent working behind closed doors this century," proclaimed Louis Gropp, Editor-in-Chief of America's House Beautiful magazine, when discussing interior designers a few years ago.

Banks-Pye was the interior design director for the decorating division of Colefax & Fowler. At first glance his work appears quite traditional because of his predominant use of antiques, old pictures and accessories, but in fact he was always re-inventing so that conventional elements could be revitalised and seen anew.

Working for Colefax & Fowler had been Roger Banks-Pye's firm ambition even as a student, but it was not until 11 July 1977, on his 29th birthday, that this dream was realised. It was also some time after joining the famous decorating firm that his exceptional talent began to emerge. Unusually for an aspiring designer, he was put in charge of the antiques department, an appointment which lasted two years. He then transferred to the decorating team of Stanley Falconer and later that of Tom Parr, where he learnt the mechanics and grammar of decoration in the grand Colefax manner.

In recent years he was in much demand as a decorator. The very graphic and theatrical way he treated architecture exhibited a bold disregard for what others would treat reverentially. He used walls and floors as blank canvases, eschewing academic correctness for original effects, which were often ironical and teasing.

The delight of the end-product was what made his work so fresh and comfortable. He used torn paper collage on walls, appliquéd squares of fabric and even napkins sewn on to curtains. These quite extraordinary solutions, along with vigorously grained woodwork, came at times surprisingly close to some three-dimensional evocation of Synthetic Cubism.

Banks-Pye was born in Sheffield in 1948, where he grew up and attended the grammar school, spending much of his time in the art department. Drawing was a key factor in developing his eye. He always maintained that taking a photograph of some detail taught you next to nothing. "You have to draw to understand and remember clearly, especially when you need to re-use what has aroused your interest," he said, and he drew beautifully.

At 18 he moved to London to study Interior Design at the North London Polytechnic. After four years he acquired an Honours degree along with his tutor's disheartening observation that his capriciousness made him unsuited for a career in interior design and that the theatre might be a more suitable choice.

After a period of unemployment, he was fortunate to work for Ewan Macleod, a gifted architect specialising in the restoration and adaptation of traditional domestic-scale buildings. This experience fuelled his inclination towards decoration, and with a financial partner Banks-Pye Designs was launched.

Combining London antique and junk shops also became part of his routine and one that persisted for the rest of his life. He was never much interested in what was generally considered fine in antiques, his taste being for the strange - those odd pieces that 20 years ago most people passed over. Scale, form, pattern and colour were the essential qualities he looked for and it was this graphic aspect of things that ultimately shaped his work.

At Colefax & Fowler the opportunity that enabled him to develop his style was the promotional aspect of the firm's work for which he was made responsible. This covered designing and decorating the window displays in Brook Street, Ebury Street and, as the company grew, Fulham Road and elsewhere. He took charge of the promotional photo shoots, and exhibition stands such as the Decorax trade fair. He also designed and dressed grand terrace beds, curtains and other accessories in the Brook Street and the Fulham Road showrooms.

It was the window displays in particular that became a talking point. Their flair and spontaneity were sufficiently outstanding to attract acclaim. This success encouraged him. He experimented with the detail of curtains, upholstery, trimmings and a wide use of accessories. In dressing the windows he sometimes used the cheapest of props such as painted picket fencing, trugs planted with moss and bulbs, charmingly elaborate slip covers over the backs of tatty iron garden furniture. It was his ability to evoke atmosphere in the confines of a small window space, coupled with a meticulous eye for detail that fascinated all who saw them.

Roger Banks-Pye had taught himself through his passion for fabrics, which he used in the closest way a decorator has come to the couturier. Nobody since John Fowler in his heyday had approached this aspect of decorating with such confidence. It is hardly surprising that both Sir Hardy Amies and Jacques Van Helmont - died earlier this year. But, of all Monnet's French associates, Emile Noël was one of the most eminent and, superficially at least, one of the greyest.

He had been born in Constantinople, later to become Istanbul; and readers of Eric Ambler's fiction might have fancied that he looked intriguingly exotic. His dark eyes drooped at the corners like those of Paul McCartney or Sylvester Stallone; his smile was rueful, almost hangdog, as if admitting that while things might be worse they could be a great deal better. At times, he resembled a melancholy Mr Punch.

Yet Noël was a resolute idealist. As what Monnet called "an outstanding young graduate" of the Ecole Normale Supérieure, he had gone to work for the non-official European Movement, and had quickly been snapped up by the newborn Council of Europe in 1949. Initially Secretary of its General Affairs Committee, after three years he had become Director of its Constitutional Committee, investigating the possibility of forming a European Political Community.

In 1954 he had become Chief de Cabinet to Guy Mollet, then the President of the Council of Europe's Consultative Assembly; and, when Mollet became Prime Minister of France in 1956, Noël moved to Paris with him.

It was while working with Mollet that Noël first grew close to Jean Monnet, as what he later called "a sort of liaison agent" between him and Mollet. His particular preoccupation was the Val Duchesse negotiations to produce the Common Market and Euratom, the European Atomic Energy Commission - the latter Monnet's special hobby-horse, because he saw it as a way to persuade France into further European integration after the failure of the European Defence Community.

As it turned out, Euratom itself was what Noël later called "a quasi-failure", and the Common Market or European Economic Community became the locomotive for change. When it was set up in Brussels in 1958, Noël was appointed Executive Secretary to its Commission. His official identity card was numbered 33; the previous 32 were those of the Commission and their personal staff. Emile Noël thus found himself, aged 35, virtually in the driving seat of Europe's power engine. The titular driver, President of the Commission was Walter Hallstein, a workaholic bachelor, a former Professor, and former Head of the German Foreign Office. But Noël, married, with two daughters, and a product of France's elite education system, was the perfect complement to Hallstein's organising zeal. He knew everyone; he knew everything he said as little as possible.

His tenacity, as Monnet said, matched his modesty. In the words of Commissioner Robert Lemaignen: "It would have been hard to find a person better fitted for his post. The Executive Secretary looks after the inner workings of the Commission, prepares its documents and its agenda, draws up its minutes (he attends all meetings, even the most confidential); he puts its decision into proper legal shape; distributes documentation to its Commissioners and Directorate-General, supervises such general services as the linguistic service, and so on. Many of these jobs demand absolute discretion and perfect tact. Noël fulfilled them perfectly."

In 1968, when the three Communities (Euratom, Coal and Steel and Common Market) were merged into one, Emile Noël was appointed their Secretary-General, a post that he held until his retirement in 1987. But retirement did not mean leisure. He at once became President of the European University Institute in Florence, and meanwhile produced several studies of the Community and its institutions: Le Comité des Représentants Permanents in 1966, Les Rouages de l'Europe in 1979, and Les Institutions des Communautés Européennes in 1988.

His one regret, he said in later life, was that Europe had not established the European Political Community on which he had worked in the 1950s. "I stepped towards a more political union was brutally interrupted he told an interviewer in 1987. "But you can never really get it economic without the political. I believe the political aspect is indispensable. A few less controls at frontiers is simply a euphemism."

The King's School, Canterbury
The Autumn Term begins today at the King's School, Canterbury. The Rev Keith Wilkinson has succeeded Canon Dr Anthony Phillips as Headmaster. Mrs Jane Wharfe becomes Housemistress of Harvey House, the fifth girls' boarding house which opens this term. An Open Morning for prospective Sixth Form pupils will be held on Sunday 5 October. Half-term will be from 12 to 27 October. Ghetto, by Joshua Sobe, will be performed in St Mary's Hall on 22-24 November. There will be a Christmas Concert in the Shirley Hall on Sunday 8 December; the Carol Service will be in the Cathedral on Wednesday 11 December and term ends on Thursday 12 December.

The Rev Dr James Maitland

It was peculiarly appropriate that at the huge funeral of the Rev Dr James Maitland, Doctor of Divinity and for four decades one of the most prominent ministers of the Church of Scotland, that a priest of the Roman Catholic Church, Father Tommy Greenham, should have been at the altar participating in the service alongside the Rev John Robertson and taking the key passage "Lord of life, conqueror of death." For Jim Maitland was the pioneer of Christian ecumenism in Scotland.

As the local MP I am in the position to know that within days of his appointment to the first charge at the birth of Livingston New Town, Maitland pressed the Roman Catholic hierarchy to set up a Catholic church in the new town, which they did as a result of his entreaties long before they had intended to do so. The facilities of the new St Columba were made available to all denominations, and a joint arrangement was set up between Maitland, the Rev Brian Hardy of the Episcopal Church, the Rev Hamish Smith of the Congregational Church, and Father John Byrne of the Roman Catholic Church to share facilities.

It was Maitland's sadness later that the Roman Catholics, co-operating in everything else, chose to build a church of their own. But the co-operation and genuine friendship is in the view of informed opinion in Scotland the paramount reason why the religious divides of the west of Scotland and possibly Northern Ireland were not imported into what was to become the largest of the Scottish new towns.

In 1996, post-Sheppard/Warlock in Liverpool, ecumenical joint action may not seem so remarkable. In the Scottish central belt, Maitland's initiative in 1966 was quite simply without precedent. A man before his time, he set an example. He would assert to Alec Eadie, MP for Midlothian, and me that a reformed church should ever be prepared itself to reform.

James Maitland was born one of three sons and two daughters of the gardener to the Bulloch family of Rhum at Fasnachuir near Oban. He was ever mindful of his strict upbringing in a devout household; his sermons were delivered in low, clear tones - his expressive eyes speaking volumes from the pulpit - and laced with biblical analogies from a life geared to the soil. From the pulpit, as in private, he was very direct, looking you hard in the eye, uncomfortably so for some.

After attending Oban High School, then as now a school with a serious academic tradition, he went to Edinburgh University and was ordained at Glenorchy in 1940 after a year at New College, the theological centre of Edinburgh University. His first charge was as assistant priest in Kirkcaldy in Fife, but typically he volunteered on a mission to Yoker in Glasgow as soon as the Clydebank bombing became serious. As his contemporaries stated: "Jim characteristically chose the hard way." He was a committed pacifist, though was determined to share dangers, not least because his brother Ian, who was awarded the DFC, had been killed over Germany as a rear gunner in a Lancaster bomber.

From Kirkcaldy he went to St Bride's in Edinburgh and became very involved with the BBC in Scotland. He was a natural as a religious broadcaster. And he was later one of the pioneers of the television service, broadcast from different churches.

Between 1954 and 1958 he committed himself to the Iona Community, then under the direction of the Rev Dr George MacLeod and the Rev Dr Ralph Morton. His contemporaries at that time would say of Maitland that like Barnabas he was "a great encourager". The Iona Community brought an evangelism to some of the new areas of Scotland and nowhere more than from Iona Community House, the hub of the organisation in Glasgow of which Maitland was the warden.

In 1958 he was chosen to go to the Aldrie West congregation where his assistant, the Rev Douglas Lamb, remembers him as a champion of the vulnerable and the less well-off. "If Jim heard that a family, religious or not, had had to go as far as breaking down the doors in their house for firewood he would personally go to see them and make it his business to become involved. He was that sort of a man."

In 1966, called to Livingston, he established an atmosphere in the church which survives to this day. Towards the end of his life I asked him what was his ambition. He replied with a remark that might have been embarassing in other people but was the essence of Jim Maitland: "Quite simply, to do the will of God."

The West must be ready to confront Saddam

Saddam Hussein on the march; a US election in the offing; Kurds making diplomatic hay; western governments at sixes and sevens. Despite the apparent Iraqi withdrawal from the city of Arbil yesterday, there is every indication that a horrendously messy international crisis in northern Iraq, in which all choices are bad choices.

One understandable gut response would be to say that the Kurds have forfeited the right to any kind of international protection. The UN safe haven is supposed to be there to protect the Kurds from Saddam; now that one group of Iraqi Kurds has invited Saddam to attack another group of Iraqi Kurds, the international community had best Rubik's cube of a civil war.

But this would be shortsighted. Two principles should guide our action, one self-interested (the overriding need to contain Saddam), the other humanitarian (an effort, where possible, to protect and succour innocent Kurdish civilians).

The Kurds' capacity for being clawed by their neighbours and political overlords is matched only by their capacity for clawing at one another. There are 22 million Kurds, by far the largest stateless nation in the world. They were among the greatest losers from the early 20th-century European taste for drawing lines, through sand and mountains, where no borders had existed before. As imperial Britain and France contended for political influence, and oil, they created a Middle East map which dismembered the Kurdish-populated territory into four main chunks: Iraqi, Iranian, Syrian and Turkish. Britain, in particular, insisted on millions of Kurds being joined to Iraq against their will, because Britain controlled Iraq and the Kurdish area contained the Mosul oil wells. Intermittently, ever since, as it has suited us, the West has encouraged the Kurds to rebel, or exhorted them to remain quiet.

Five years ago we were in the business of drawing lines once again. After the Gulf war, at US instigation, the Kurds revolted against Saddam. The Iraqi army showed a greater taste for killing Kurdish civilians than fighting to hold on to Kuwait. The UN declared a safe haven for Kurds in northern Iraq, and later a somewhat larger no-fly zone, barring Iraqi fixed-wing aircraft.

The international legality, and the precise terms, of these pledges to the Kurds have always been in doubt. But a wary calm survived for three years. Saddam, licking his wounds, stayed away. A considerable international relief effort was mounted through Turkey. But the West, uncertain what it wanted to do with its de facto Kurdish statelet, made little corresponding political effort to prevent the Kurdish factions from falling to their second favourite occupation, fighting each other.

The resulting situation, tragic and menacing, is also frankly bizarre. One of the Iraqi-Kurd groups – the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) – has enlisted support from Iran (despite the fact that this enables the Islamic republic to bash more effectively its own Kurdish rebels). In retaliation, the PUK's sworn enemies, the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), have sought the military aid of Saddam, the man who used chemical weapons against Kurdish women and children. Both groups have variously worked and then quarrelled with the Turkish Kurdish separatist group, the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), which yesterday threatened retaliatory action against the Saddam-supported KDP.

Out of this deadly alphabet soup, the West must now try to fashion some kind of coherent policy.

Bill Clinton, with Republicans queuing to accuse him of being soft on Saddam, is evidently anxious to zap someone or something. A cruise missile or stealth aircraft strike against Iraqi military targets might be one option. The British government believes that Saddam must be punished to prevent him gaining strategic territory and prestige. Either we stop him now, the Government seems to be saying, or he will keep on pushing us until we are forced to do something even more difficult and dramatic. The French are doubtful. Many Middle East governments, including those that supported Operation Desert Storm, see little reason to come to the aid of one Kurdish group (particularly a group supported by Iran).

What is more, it remains unclear whether there is international legal backing for military action by the West. The Kurdish "safe haven" does not encompass the city of Arbil; but the no-fly zone does. If the Iraqi forces fall back, Saddam might regain de facto control of much of northern Iraq through his new Kurdish clients, without formally crossing any line in the sand.

This is not August 1990 all over again. The strategic case for chasing Saddam out of Kuwait was overwhelming. There is no such clarity this time. But the longer history of international dealings with Saddam suggests that the Government is right. It is important to face Saddam down at the earliest opportunity. If he fails to move his forces far away from Arbil – not just to the outskirts – the West should threaten, and if necessary, carry out punitive strikes on Iraqi military targets. But these should not just be electoral air-raids, designed to satisfy US public opinion. We must be ready for a prolonged confrontation if necessary. We must, even at this late and seemingly hopeless stage, engage in robust diplomacy to try to reconcile the Kurdish factions. And we should be making urgent plans to assist the Kurdish civilian population.

The battle of the books

The latest wheeze to interest us in books is a national argument about the top 100 best novels of the century. This has the smell of a bookseller's promotion, perhaps cynically designed to get us talking about "great" works. We are all for it. Most of us enjoy compiling lists of greatest and worsts, from footballers to family holidays. But the great novels game is particularly enjoyable because of the swank-and-bluff factor. The literary editor's top 10 brought howls of derision from some in this office, who capped it with more obscure works. The only outcome of this kind of game is that lots of people sneak out and buy major novels they hadn't heard of before. Which is, as the authors of 1066 and All That would put it, A Good Thing.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

New Labour lurching back to Victoria

Sir: Before the debate between Democratic Socialism and Social Democracy is frozen in a re-run of the familiar argument in which "New Labour" are forever defeating "Old Labour", your leaders may like to be reminded of what two right-wing and highly respected leaders of the Labour Party had to say about Socialism.

The first came from Hugh Gaitskell's speech in the Commons in 1945 in which, talking about the Labour government, he said: "We believe, for example, that the present capitalist system is ineffective, that it produces insecurity and that it is unjust. Can anyone deny these things?"

The second comes from John Smith as an Energy Minister, arguing for the public ownership of oil in 1975: "We bring forward proposals for public ownership, because we are Socialists."

"Modernisation" is in reality a code word for the attempt, now being made, to persuade the Labour Party to go back to the Victorian era when both Conservatives and Liberals were equally committed to the worship of market forces.

Yet it is these very same market forces which have led to the situation reported in the Independent on Sunday (21 July): 447 dollar billionaires enjoy wealth that exceeds the annual income of half the world's people."

Does anyone really believe that an economic system that can produce such inequality should serve as our guide to the politics of the 21st century?

Pedestrians need rights of way

Sir: You have published several items on the problems of automobile traffic in Britain (Letters, 29 August). The simplest way to reverse the hierarchy between cars and pedestrians could be to ensure that pedestrians generally have priority over road vehicles, as in many other countries, rather than having to refer to them everywhere except at pedestrian crossings.

In Britain, motorists at intersections do not yield to pedestrians, who must always be extremely vigilant. At some crosswalks pedestrians can wait for ages. I believe that this "right of way" mentality also contributes to the aggressiveness of British motorists.

Walking in Britain would be much easier and safer if, instead, drivers at intersections had to wait for pedestrians to cross before proceeding. Short of that, there should at least be proper pedestrian crossings.

It would be a joy to walk in British towns without having to pay attention to road traffic and slip across streets like small deliberately obstruct public roads to stop us.

Did it occur to these petty obstructionists that there could have been doctors travelling to see seriously ill patients, fire engines trying to get to burning buildings? What about parents going to collect children from school, people on their way to important appointments, mail vans collecting letters?

"Reclaim the Streets" has no legal or moral right to behave like this and I hope the law, which does not "favour motorists too much" but is even-handed, will properly punish all those responsible.

Sir: Your article "How the peaceful country lanes of old England have been placed on the certain road to destruction" (28 August) paints a dreary picture.

Oh horror, you show a photograph of 10 metres of road in 1930 with no cars on it and a photograph of today of 50 metres of road with three cars and an agricultural vehicle on it.

Of course traffic has grown since the 1930s, as have prosperity and changes in lifestyle. More people visit the countryside to enjoy the birdsong and bees buzzing in the hedges.

The majority travel by car, as it is the most flexible means of getting there. The Council for the Protection of Rural England presents 50 rural routes being ruined by traffic. I could present 100 rural routes where I cycle every weekend that are not.

No one wants to see more traffic in the countryside but half-baked scare stories do not benefit anyone.

The RAC has been involved with the Countryside Commission, North Yorks Moors National Park and Oxford Brookes University looking at practical traffic management measures to ease the pressure of cars in the countryside. Let us look to practical solutions rather than emotive statements about the evil of cars.

Rapid delivery is retailing's future

Sir: The key to the development of retailing lies in the ability and willingness of retailers to deliver – literally.

The future of retailing lies in simpler technology than the Internet (report, 23 August, letter, 29 August). All you need is a city-centre store to display the goods and a bar-code reader. Customers wander around the display of goods, "swiping" as they go. At the exit, the reader is totalled and printed.

The customer pays, the store guarantees delivery within a three-hour slot, including evenings. All deliveries are made from a cheap warehouse site.

Customers don't need cars, firms don't need enormous supermarkets but can still display a wide range of commodities.

All it needs is a lead from a major operator.

Humanism kept out of schools

Sir: The Bishop of Ludlow suggests (letter, 30 August) judging religions by the "methods used to instil and reinforce [their] beliefs". Surely we should mark down heavily those who seek to prevent the young knowing about other beliefs?

The Christian powers who preponderate in England today do just this. They support legislation designed to prevent children in state schools learning about Humanism, which is the principal alternative to the religions present in England.

The justification for "RE" is that it helps pupils to understand the ultimate questions of living: life and death, the importance of morality, the reality (or otherwise) of "God". It is to indoctrinate with religion to present the religious responses to these questions without acknowledging the reality of the non-religious responses.

The immediate reply to Canon Inge (letter, 30 August) is that Humanism – the life stance that Richard Dawkins supports – is not a religion, because it does not accept the reality of "God". The critical point is that if in truth there is no god, it follows that all religions are so deeply flawed that all will be rejected by those who understand.

This does not mean, however, that Humanists wish to prevent children in state schools learning about religions. Unlike religious people, we want these children to learn about religious and non-theistic responses to ultimate questions – objectively, fairly, and with balance.

No Western help for the Kurds

Sir: The current crisis in northern Iraq underlines just how badly the main lesson of the Gulf War has been learnt. That lesson was that the West has only one interest in Iraq, and that is in keeping the area stable so that oil, and profits, continue to flow. Hence Saddam was not removed from power, as he easily could have been, but simply warned off.

It is no surprise that a section of the Kurds should look, if not exactly to Saddam, then to the force he can exert, since the main Western ally in the region, Turkey, continues to pursue its murderous war against the Kurds. Neither Saddam nor the West will do anything for the future of ordinary Kurds. The Turkish and Iraqi working classes might, if they can boot out the current regimes which run their respective countries. There will be no prizes for guessing which side of the West would be on in such a struggle however – not that, as ever, of the Kurds.

BBC changes spell disaster

Sir: Two things need to be said about the reorganisation of the BBC ("Birt begins the BBC break-up", 30 August).

The first concerns the reasons for it. Who is it that needs digital TV? The public may think it sounds wonderful to have 199 channels to choose from.

Do they imagine that these channels are going to be comparable to the BBC and ITV? The fragmentation of the market guarantees that no channel will have enough money to make decent programmes. You can already see this on satellite TV.

The second point is that the separation of the broadcasting and production arms of the BBC will inevitably lead to a disastrous lowering of standards, as has already happened elsewhere. Production people will not be attracted to working in the broadcasting arm and it will become the domain of the accountant and the man who cares for nothing but the bottom line.

As sole gatekeepers to the airwaves, they will very quickly impose their standards on the producers.

Juries denied the wisdom of age

Sir: Today I have – very reluctantly – put a tick against my name on the electoral registration form because, having reached the age of 70 in July, I am now no longer eligible for jury service.

The form is so worded that it seems to suggest that jury service is something that everyone wants to avoid. I was in fact looking forward very much to serving on a jury and was most disappointed when – the summons having arrived about 20 years ago – we were all sent home without even being sworn in when the accused decided to plead guilty.

Since then I have retired, and have been hoping that I would be called again. Unlike on the former occasion, when I was a very busy person running a single-handed architectural practice, I would not be inconvenienced at all.

Nobody should be obliged to do jury service if they are unfit or in a position when such service would be damaging to their business or family life, but nowadays, when so many retired people are still fit and intelligent, they should be given the chance to say "yes" or "no".

GNVQ system working well

Because of the nature of the assessments in GNVQ, candidates will not all complete their courses at the same time. Each week the awarding bodies notify Ucas of results. If there are candidates that need fast-track confirmation they can ring a hotline number which has been widely publicised.

Can Prozac destroy our free will?

The most famous drug of the Nineties was blamed for a mass killing. Establishing its innocence has restored our humanity, says Andrew Brown

Joe Wesbecker was a man with a bad life. His second ex-wife was still friends with him, but that was about the extent of his success. One son was a compulsive flasher; the other had an expensive and disfiguring curvature of the spine. Joe himself was off sick after working for 17 years in the Standard Gravure printing plant in Louisville, Kentucky. The work there was unremitting and had grown worse over the years as the seven presses, each 150 feet long, and three storeys high, were worked harder and harder by fewer and fewer men.

In 1986 the business was bought by Michael Shea, a 36-year-old entrepreneur, who paid $22m for it. The first thing he did was to call the staff together and tell them the future would be better. The second was to use $11m from the pension fund to pay back some of the money he'd borrowed to buy the company.

Wesbecker frequently worked two eight-hour shifts in succession for the sake of the overtime, as did many of his co-workers. It would be wrong to call them colleagues, because the word implies friendliness or mutual solidarity. But in the Standard Gravure printing plant the working men treated each other as badly as the owners, bullying, needling, and threatening. Wesbecker called the management style "industrial sodomy". Men would bring guns to work and boast about how some day they were going to get even. Wesbecker once walked around with the curved ammunition clip from an AK47 in his back pocket.

Finally, in August 1988 he was sent home, diagnosed as depressed. He was treated, as usual, with drugs. In the years since 1984, various doctors prescribed him Valium, Percodan, Indocin, Elavil, Norpramin, Navane, Tofranil, Lithobid, Pamelor, Halcion, Desyrel and Restoril. Few of these substances helped. In September 1989 his last doctor, Lee Coleman, tried him on Prozac. This caused him to remember, or to believe he had remembered, that he had had to fettle a foreman at the printing plant to avoid operating one of the more terrible machines there. Dr Coleman told him to stop taking Prozac and come back in a week's time.

Instead, three days later, Wesbecker walked back into the printing plant with an AK47 and three spare clips. He shot 20 of his co-workers, killing eight, and maiming two more, then killed himself with an automatic pistol.

Who could blame him?

Eli Lilly did.

The company makes Prozac. Perhaps a third of its $6.5bn revenues were dependent on the drug; and when the survivors of the printing plant shootings, and the widows of the dead, brought a suit against the company in 1994, the company's lawyers set out, by a minute examination of every detail of Wesbecker's life, to prove that he was bad, not mad. Now John Cornwell, one of the best living writers on the changes that science is making in our understanding of humanity, has written a book about the trial - from which all the facts have been lifted without shame.

Quite a lot of the story is still unclear. The jury in Louisville found in favour of Eli Lilly, but only after the plaintiffs had decided not to introduce some of their evidence. This they did after reaching a financial settlement with Lilly, which is rumoured to have been immense. The terms of the settlement are still secret, though we know that one of its terms was that the beneficiaries could not talk publicly about it.

Even the fact that the settlement had been reached was kept from both judge and jury until after the verdict was announced. This so enraged Judge Potter, when he found out, that he decided to conduct a hearing into the deal. This move was resisted by Lilly; the state supreme court, however, sided with Judge Potter, saying in its judgment: "There may have been deception, bad faith conduct, abuse of the judicial process, or perhaps even fraud," Judge Potter's findings are due to be announced this autumn.

In the meantime, the Prozac trial has raised in its sharpest form the question of whether the American courts, and thus American society, actually have any satisfactory theory of what it means to be a moral being. The jury, according to Cornwell, was forced to decide between two equally unsatisfactory models of Wesbecker's nature. Either he was a victim or a criminal. Either he was wholly responsible for everything he did, riding alone through society like some Clint Eastwood figure, a man whose every act was his own, and who could never be touched by the ties of community or love. Or he was no more than the outcome of an argument of chemicals.

When Wesbecker stalked through the plant where he had worked for years, maiming and killing everyone who had offended him, was his motivation no more than bad reactions in a chemical soup? Could he have helped himself? And if so, who is the "he" who could have helped himself?

Both stereotypes, the victim and the criminal, have deep roots in American culture. This is shown by a bizarre moment in Cornwell's account of the murders. Halfway through his rampage Wesbecker, spattered with blood and clutching his submachine gun, met a co-worker he had always quite liked, and told him to get out of the way. "Go to it, Rocky," replied his friend, and ran, and survived. "Go to it, Rocky": of all the ways we might react if confronted by a crazed gunman, perhaps that is the most shameful. Yet anyone who has seen films about a lone avenger, or who has enjoyed computer games like Doom, will know exactly what he meant, and why he said it. Go to it, Rocky, smash all our cages for us.

This spectre of complete wild freedom, wholly unbounded, grows stronger the more we see the ways in which science and economics conspire to rob us of even the smallest spontaneity. The workers at the Standard Gravure printing plant were steadily ground down as more and more scope for initiative and fun was removed from their lives.

The parallels across the industrial world are easy to see. Each successive heat in the rat race is run over a longer, tougher course at higher speeds. And this crushing of individuality probably does as much as fear of crime to explain the hold that guns have on the American imagination. If guns were not a totem of freedom for everyone, it would seem simply insane to sue the firm that made Wesbecker's tranquillisers and not the shop that sold him an assault rifle and $137 worth of ammunition.

Still, freedom diminishes every year. Science - or the marketing departments of chemical companies - holds out the hope that more and more of human behaviour will be predictable and ultimately controllable. The science behind Prozac is still remarkably imprecise: it works by affecting the levels of serotonin in the brain: a neuropsychologist once told me that this was like trying to improve the economy by fiddling with interest rates - but of course economics is a much more precise science than brain chemistry.

None the less, there are researchers who believe that studying the workings of the brain events. Even without that detailed knowledge, argue people like Colin Blakemore, an Oxford psychologist, we can be certain in principle that free will is an illusion, because thoughts are brain states, and brain states, like everything else in the physical world, change according to physical laws we know and understand.

The idea underlying this is that a suitably equipped outside observer could know my own mind literally better than I could. The argument does not convince everyone. It frightens those judges who have thought about it. If we take seriously the idea that free will is an illusion, some crimes, like rape, must disappear completely; and sentencing policy will become extremely odd, though perhaps no odder than it is at present in America.

Yet in real life we are neither wholly victims nor wholly criminals, and the ideas we use every day bear this out. In everyday life, we have an idea, however blurred, of what it means to be provoked beyond endurance and of how we normally are not. We know what self-control means, even if we can't define it. Something important about being human is missing if it is reduced to the choice between being a victim and a criminal.

These may seem abstract points. But billions of dollars rode on them in the Louisville trial. If Lilly lost, one senior executive said, the whole company could go down the tubes. Prozac was worth a third of its revenues. And the case was being decided by an ordinary jury whose members could probably not even now explain what a selective serotonin reuptake inhibitor is or why it is supposed to work.

How, then, could they decide whether such a chemical was responsible for tipping Joe Wesbecker over the edge? By making the settlement they did, Lilly's executives may have risked accusations of "deception, bad faith conduct, abuse of the judicial process, or perhaps even fraud". But I think we should be grateful that they chose to do so. Human beings are not mere victims of their brain chemistry. Free will and responsibility are social ideas, which have been laboriously hammered out in every human society. They describe us in our inescapable character as social beings. Without them, there would be no societies and no human beings.

He shot 20 of his workmates, killing eight, then shot himself. And who could blame him?

brain will soon put us in a position where free will and responsibility will evaporate as real explanations for human behaviour in the same way as witchcraft has. The brain, they say, is a physical system, obeying physical and chemical laws. We know what these laws are already. All we have to do is to discover their detailed applica-

Things to do when you're stuck in Lothian

I mentioned yesterday that I had seen lots of bus shelters in Edinburgh this year adorned with a notice that read: "Beware - the top of this bus shelter has been treated with anti-climb paint!"

What I didn't say, because I didn't know, is what anti-climb paint is. While it is always nice to be in at the birth of a new word (can't find "anti-climb" in any of the dictionaries I have looked at), it's also irritating not to be able to visualise this new stuff, or how it works. You can't easily examine the tops of bus shelters except by climbing up there, and that is what anti-climb paint was invented to prevent in the first place.

"All right! Come on down! It's against the law to climb on bus shelters!"

"I wasn't climbing the bus shelter, officer. I was just trying to see what anti-climb paint looked like."

"That's a good one."

"It's the truth. I'm an investigative journalist, and I owe it to my readers to find out..."

A friend of mine who has seen the stuff says that it is like paint except that it is very thick and sticky, and doesn't dry properly, but he isn't sure if it is designed to make a mess of your clothes or to stick to you. My feeling is that it wasn't invented at all. Things like this don't get invented. They are usually accidents.

For instance, I remember reading 20 years ago about some chemical company that had been trying to create one thing, a cure for athlete's foot or something similar, and had come up with something quite different - a cream that turned things brown. That's all it did. Turned things brown. It was useless. They were about to throw it away when someone had a brilliant idea. It was not quite useless. They could market it as a suntan aid. They did, and made a fortune.

Similarly, you can imagine a paint firm coming up with one that never dries, and has an unpleasantly adhesive quality, and the paint is about to be ditched for ever, when some keen young executive cries: "Wait! I have a chum working for the Lothian Region who tells me they are desperate for a way of stopping people climbing on to bus shelters! This could be the answer!"

Months later, everyone is either very happy, very rich or stuck to the top of a bus shelter in Edinburgh.

Perhaps in the early hours of the morning the Edinburgh police send round a bus shelter recovery team. Mission: inspect the top of all bus shelters. Aim: locate and remove all persons sticking to them, and take them to hospital to be treated for exposure.

"Stuck out all night, were you?"

"Yes, doctor."

"What mountain were you up on?"

"It was not exactly a mountain..."

"Was it very high?"

"About 10 feet."

"!!!!!!"

"Well, you see, I'm an investigative journalist, and I wanted to know what this anti-climb paint on bus shelters was like..."

"So you've been stuck up on a bus shelter all night?"

"Yes."

"Did you not call for help?"

"I banged on the roof of the bus shelter, but the people below me in the bus queue thought it was the people upstairs having a bit of a wild time and banged back."

Potentially humiliating. But not as bad as another humiliation which could take place a quarter of a mile away. In Rose Street there is a large climbing and walking shop called Tiso, and on the third floor, where they sell all the climbing and walking boots, there are various places where you can test your footwear.

There is a ramp on the floor down which you can walk to see if the toes behave properly when you are going down a steep mountain. And there is a wall nearby which has plastic imitation rocks screwed to it, so that you can climb up it with your new climbing boots to test their holding qualities. (The imitation rocks were probably invented in the same way as the suntan aid or the anti-climb paint - by ignorance.)

Beside the wall, there is a notice that I have never seen before in a shoe shop, saying simply: "Customers use the climbing wall at their own risk." You can see the point. No shoemaker wants a serious climbing accident in his shop. But then no customer wants to be taken to hospital this way...

"Hello, it's you again. Been stuck on another bus shelter?"

"No, doctor. It's a climbing accident this time."

"A climbing accident? On a bus shelter?"

"No, doctor. In a shoe shop, actually..."

The very model of a modern social democrat

Considering Labour's recent initiatives, you'd be forgiven for thinking that the SDP breakaway never happened.

The biggest surprise about Tony Blair's decision to answer happily to the term "modern social democrat" is that it should be a surprise at all. The anonymous Sunday Times at the weekend that Blair's remark was a rash and retrospective endorsement of what he called the SDP "traitors" who broke away from the Labour Party in 1981, is missing something important.

Let's not dwell on the pleasing but now irrelevancy of the term. It has an impeccable Marxist pedigree, that it was used approvingly by Rosa Luxemburg, or that of the founding fathers of the British Communist Party. No: what the Blair critic is the point that all the goals which the Gang of Four decided they couldn't achieve within the Labour Party of the early 1980s, have now been realised - the reversal of unilateralism, the acceptance of the EU, (both by Kinnoch) the return of the party to its members (by Kinnoch, Smith and Blair), and an embracing of the private sector (most spectacularly by Tony Blair, through the replacement of Clause IV).

You can argue endlessly about whether they were right to break away, but you can't argue that the SDP breakaway would have happened if Labour was what it is today. Every prominent member of the Labour Party has signed up to a party which is now fit, at least in terms of its policies, for an ex-SDP member to live in if he or she chooses. The official line from the Blair office is that this is a trifling argument about terminology and that Blair has always made it clear he is equally happy being called a social democrat or a democratic socialist, the term publicly preferred by John Prescott.

But that does Blair's choice of the term less than justice. "Democratic Socialist" has a cold war origin: it was a term that post-war Labour politicians, from Herbert Morrison on, used to differentiate themselves from East European communists. It was reinvented in the 1980s by Labour politicians precisely to differentiate themselves from the SDP. Both the circumstances which gave rise to the use of the term have now dissolved. Which John Prescott, a politician with a keen sense of Labour history, is certainly intelligent enough to know. Since Tony Blair came into office, there is no substantive change in party policy in which John Prescott hasn't played a part. And in that sense, however reluctant he is to do so, he could justifiably paraphrase Lord Harewood and say: "We are all social democrats now."

As often, therefore, the spat is about something else. First, Mr Prescott is restive; there are real and unresolved tensions between the leader's office and his deputy's, involving Prescott's status in the hierarchy and the amount of information to which he has access. Secondly, and more importantly, there is continuing unease within the Parliamentary party, from sections of the Shadow Cabinet down, about whether, in the drive for middle class votes, the party is in danger of neglecting its core supporters. The degree of personal sympathy between Robin Cook and Mr Prescott has been greatly exaggerated; but expect a pointed and carefully crafted speech from

Mr Cook before too long, reaffirming Labour as the party to offer hope to the urban poor. This is a real enough worry, and Blair will have to address it at the party conference next month. He won't, of course, resile from modernisation, as he made amply clear at the weekend. But it is a fair bet that he will go out of his way to remind the conference that however modest-seeming the five pledges it will endorse in Blackpool may be - from a better NHS to youth jobs - the impact will be felt most keenly by some of the least privileged. To take just one example, law and order isn't the most fashionable issue among the Labour intelligentsia; but it's precisely in the poorer and least protected council estates that it is most unchecked.

Finally, he can draw on Labour tradition to demonstrate that social democracy has its roots deep in Party history. You don't, for example, have to look further than the pre-war South Wales miners, who furnished themselves with mutual welfare and libraries, to realise that self-reliance and supportive communities don't necessarily rely solely on the state.

It's true that the term "modern social democrat" consciously rejects not only state socialism but also the tax-and-spend philosophy of Tony Crosland. But it also carries the inherent message that the market cannot, alone and unfettered, answer the people's needs. It expresses, for all its connotations in the factional history of the party, the real distinction between neo-thatcherism and its only seriously viable alternative.

It still seems hardly decent to say so, but on the day of John Smith's death I was discussing the possible succession with two Labour MPs, one a member of the left wing Campaign Group, who declared himself for Tony Blair. But, said his astonished colleague, Blair's a social democrat. "Well," said the Campaign Group member, "social democracy is a great deal better than what the country's had for the last 16 years."

Exactly. That analysis, rather milder than the one on offer from Blair's anonymous front bench critic at the weekend, makes two important points. First, for all the huffing and puffing Tony Blair hasn't told us anything we didn't know already. But secondly, Blair isn't just distinguishing new Labour from some of its quite recent past: he is also drawing the real, rather than the imagined, dividing line between Labour and the Tories.

Time to drop an E, Mother Teresa

It's never too late to abandon sainthood, says Jack O'Sullivan

There is still time for Mother Teresa. The word from Calcutta is that she's wobbly but should be out of intensive care shortly. She has a chance then, however remote, to avoid impending sainthood. Mother Teresa should grab it with both hands, and Albanian hands. Otherwise she will never get a moment's peace again.

In the past, good souls such as herself, worn out by a lifetime of selflessness, had plenty of time to recover before the next step: it took nearly three centuries for the 40 English Reformation martyrs to be declared saints in 1970.

These days, though, the process is becoming indecently quick. No longer are two miracles needed for beatification and then another couple for sanctity. Now one suffices on each count. And the old "devil's advocate", appointed to dig the dirt on a would-be saint, has been abolished.

This amounts to a fast track to sainthood. Escrava de Balaguer, founder of the religious order Opus Dei, died in 1975, but he has already been beatified. Who knows when this Pope, who has canonised more folk than all his predecessors combined, will grant him the ultimate accolade? As for Mother Teresa, given her record, she may barely get through Purgatory and past the Pearly Gates before duty calls again.

And of duty, there is plenty. Being a saint is not just about playing a bigger harp than everyone else. You have to intercede with Himself for us lesser mortals. The work load can be very heavy. Think how many people consult St Anthony, patron saint of lost property. Given her CV, Mother Teresa would no doubt be given a portfolio covering the poor, a remit currently held by two 13th century saints - Anthony of Padua and Ferdinand III of Castile. The trouble is that, once a saint, you never know when the call to duty will come. St Bona lived in the 12th century and was famed for enjoying pilgrimages. Imagine her surprise when Pope John Paul XXIII made her the patron saint of air stewardesses. Or the confusion of St Fiacre, a seventh century Irishman who now finds he's patron saint of taxi drivers. St Jude had the toughest deal. For nearly two millennia, the worst thing that had happened to him was being martyred. Then in the 1920s he was given the "hopeless causes" brief in a ruse to raise money for a church in Chicago.

Of course, it isn't easy to undo a blameless life at this stage. Once past 80, promiscuity and excessive drug-taking are out. Mother Teresa can't rev a souped-up Ford Capri, pop a few "E"s and let the wimple fly. She's stuck now with the sins of old age - gluttony, pride, avarice, complaining about the nurses, that type of stuff. It'll be tough to be bad. But Mother Teresa should weigh up her options carefully. Sainthood sounds like hell.

London: capital of the revolution

Why do Islamic dissidents in exile flock to the UK? Emma Daly reports on the eve of a major rally

"London", shouts the press release for next weekend's Rally for Islamic Revival, "the capital of the world-wide Islamic movements". The rally, aka the 1996 International Islamic Conference, is intended to draw thousands of Muslims, local and foreign, to London Docklands to discuss the way forward to a single Islamic state.

It will, continues the press release, "maintain London's leading position in the Ummah as the centre for political revival of Islam, and the main opposition centre for the eventual Islamic revolution in Muslim lands".

This might surprise those accustomed to seeing Islamic dissent as the intellectual face of terrorism and to hearing Michael Howard's assaults on asylum-seekers. But Britain has a glorious history of hospitality to political radicals - and with the demise of apartheid and the fall of the Wall, Muslims opposed to their own governments are the last dissenters of the 20th century. Most flee authoritarian repression; some are seeking liberal democracy; others want Allah's heaven on earth.

Sheikh Omar Bakri Muhammad, the man behind the Rally for Revival, is a Syrian opposed to all the present Middle Eastern and Asian Muslim regimes. For him, even the Islamic Republic in Iran is heathen and corrupt, let alone the dictatorship in Iraq and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Egypt and Algeria have complained about the meeting and asked the British Government to ban it; some delegates, Mr Muhammad says, have been denied visas for Britain or have been turned back at airports.

However, he has few complaints about the authorities in Britain, acknowledging that he is able freely to conduct his mission for a global Islamic revolution. "They believe in freedom of speech, so they must practise what they preach," Mr Muhammad, who has applied for British citizenship, says. He relishes the paradox that his proselytising is aimed at destroying the system that allows him to preach in the first place. He adds that the British sowed the seeds of their ultimate downfall through their support for Kemal Ataturk and the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, the single Islamic state cherished by Mr Muhammad. "Because London called for the destruction of the Khalifate on 3 March 1924," he says, "the conspiracy against Islam and Muslims comes from Britain." But "this has backfired on [the British] ... from that day, the Muslims looked to Britain as the head of the Western powers that caused destruction."

Other Muslim expatriates explain London's premier position in the Islamic opposition scene differently. "It is because of the history of Britain and the Empire," says Mai Ghossein, who runs the Saqi bookshop in west London. "All English-speaking Arabs come to London. It is a tolerant city - people can dress the way they want to, for example." Moreover, a large section of the Arab press - both official and dissident - is printed in London, which assumed the mantle of Middle Eastern communications centre from Beirut as a result of the Lebanese war.

"Most of the so-called fundamentalists in this country are only dangerous to themselves," says Foad Nahdi, editor of the Muslim weekly Q-News, who feels that British Muslims are constantly and unfairly tarred with the brush of dangerous fundamentalism. "For the vast majority here there's a lot of worry about anti-Muslim bias, about how they're going to pay their mortgages and educate their kids. After that they don't have time to think about the global Islamic movement." Mr Ghossein and Mr Muhammad agree that in Britain, Muslims and/or Arabs of all persuasions can meet on common ground. For her, London offers a common language and a "cultural space" in which people can browse through political tracts or poetry, and wear anything from the floor-length black chador compulsory in Riyadh to the smart Western suits that he favours. Mr Muhammad would almost certainly have been imprisoned if he lived in Syria. His rally is supposed to hear videotaped messages from jail cells: a

He has been asked to pay for extra security around the Arena nevertheless, and the Jewish community at least is worried about the presence of Islamic radicals. "We regard it as one of the major threats facing both us and the general community," says Mike Whine, spokesman for the Board of Deputies of British Jews. "Many Islamist groups are violently anti-Western. They regard Britain as an enemy ... [and] contain to a greater or lesser extent anti-Semitism within their general outlook."

Mr Whine does say that such extremists represent "a very small minority" within the Muslim community, but his fears are shared by the Government. It plans a law to give British courts jurisdiction over "acts of conspiracy and incitement" committed in the UK in respect of offences committed abroad. This, the Home Office says, "will also help to control the activities of foreign extremists who use this country as a base to plan or encourage criminal acts abroad."

But one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter. Activists of Algeria's Islamic Salvation Front continue to operate in Britain. Last week, Nadir Remli, an Algerian with British citizenship, was handing out copies of The Enlightenment, an FIS newsletter, outside the Regent's Park mosque. "No room left to reason [with] the criminal military regime in Algeria!" says the headline. An inside page offers "News of Jihad and Mujahadeen" in Algeria, with an approving tally of soldiers and policemen killed recently.

But he says he does not want to remain in Britain for ever. "This is not paradise, this is a bridge. We will go back [to Algeria] when it is like Britain and we can worship our God and we are in full control of our destiny."

Should the FIS win control of Algeria, it is unlikely to repeat the democratic experiment that would have brought it to power in 1992 - Algeria will never be like Britain. At the very least there is a risk that this weekend's conference is exploiting Britain's liberal tradition: but banning it would diminish the principles that uphold our society and be a victory for those who seek its destruction.

The towers of Islam rise above the London skyline. This is not paradise, this is a bridge, says an Algerian activist

"The British believe in freedom of speech, so they must practise what they preach"

brush of dangerous fundamentalism. "For the vast majority here there's a lot of worry about anti-Muslim bias, about how they're going to pay their mortgages and educate their kids. After that they don't have time to think about the global Islamic movement."

Metaphysics was traditionally about life, the universe and everything. The Greek philosopher began the search for a convincing answer to the question: what, if anything, underlies the world as we know it? And philosophers since, whether idealists or realists, theists or materialists, have taken up this question.

But one of the most famous of 20th-century philosophers taught that metaphysics is impossible, a futile exercise in pondering the imponderable and ending up talking nonsense. In his book Language, Truth and Logic, published in 1936, AJ Ayer argued that metaphysical speculation is literally meaningless. The big questions about the existence of God, of purpose in the world, of an overarching explanation of what it's all about are simply beyond our ken; they are not worth talking about.

Ayer had just returned to Britain from his exciting conversations with the Vienna Circle, a group of philosophers known as Logical Positivists. They taught young Freddie to recite the Verification Principle, which, let it be admitted, is itself a bit of a conundrum. It says: "The meaning of a statement is its method of verification." Which being translated reads: If you want to know whether something is the case, step outside and take a look. Except, that is, for mathematics, in which case you don't have to step outside; you just know that mathematical propositions are true by the meanings of the symbols themselves. In the jargon, they are said to be "analytic". Everything else you verify by observation.

Of course, when it comes to observation, you have to know where to look. We know where to look for tables and chairs - or at least for what Ayer called "sense-data" of them. But where do you look for such as God or purpose or the meaning of life? According to Ayer and the Verification Principle, we don't know where to look for these things. We don't know what sort of evidence would count for their verification.

A whiff of Logical Positivism has hung about ever since Ayer's day. Most people regard metaphysics as one of the childish things which the brave modern world has put away. But a few philosophers did reply to Ayer, asking the inconvenient question: "Hang on a minute - this Verification Principle of yours - how do we go about verifying it?" You can't verify it by the only means of verification that the principle itself allows. And so there are no Logical Positivists left nowadays.

The lesson is that we can't help doing metaphysics, one way or another: even the Verification Principle itself is a metaphysical doctrine because it sets out the limits to what can be known.

So where should we turn for an exposition of metaphysical philosophy? Before you try the rest, try the best.

Plato (428-347BC) was perhaps the first systematic metaphysician, and he suggested that reality is hierarchical. It begins with the lowest of phenomena, such as dreams and fantasies, and progresses upwards on the ladder of being through physical objects towards mathematical objects and finally to ideas or Forms, which, for Plato, are the perfect examples of things (eg, tables and chairs) and qualities (eg, colours). The highest reality of all is the Form of the Good.

When the Middle Ages rediscovered Aristotle, a great metaphysical row broke out. This was called the Realist-Nominalist controversy. Is there such a thing as redness apart from red objects, or are general terms only names? William of Ockham (1285-1349) was something of a referee in this squabble - though actually he was rather partisan in favour of the Nominalists. He gave philosophers a maxim which was known as Ockham's razor, Entia non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem - roughly, Don't have more things in your metaphysics than you need.

The row rumbled on for centuries, until Kant (1724-1804) came along and changed the rules. The gist of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason is: Forget all this pretension to know the meaning of life, the universe and everything - for you can't know these things. Humans understand the universe as a small understandable bit. In other words, we can only understand what we are equipped to understand. For Kant, these things were mere appearances, phenomena; we cannot see through appearances to the noumena, how things are in themselves.

It was just this view - that we could somehow see reality clear - that made the Logical Positivists see red, so to speak. The post-war Existentialists also regarded all metaphysics as a kind of personal affront. Jean-Paul Sartre, for example, said metaphysics is impossible because it deals with essences, whereas the reality is that "my existence precedes my essence".

Maybe FH Bradley (1846-1924) displayed the right sort of philosophical phlegm about these matters when he said: "Metaphysics is the finding of bad reasons for what we believe upon instinct." Tomorrow: Logic

Farnborough '96: British Aerospace sees merger of European defence companies as only hope against US competitors

MICHAEL HARRISON

British Aerospace is spearheading attempts to create a single European commercial aircraft and defence grouping by the turn of the century to compete with the might of the Americans.

The hugely ambitious strategy would see BaE disappear as an independent company over the next five years through a merger with one or more of its counterparts in Germany, France, Italy and Spain.

BaE has not ruled out a merger of its military aircraft and missiles business with GEC as a forerunner to the creation of an all-embracing European aerospace holding company.

The aim of the strategy would be to establish a grouping with the scale, resources, technological know-how and marketing power to take on the likes of Lockheed Martin and Boeing of the United States.

Senior BaE executives liken it to the creation of an aerospace version of Royal Dutch Shell or Unilever.

One said: "The case for Europe getting together is overwhelming because if we don't have consolidation across Europe the Americans will win. If British Aerospace still exists in its present form in five years, then we will have failed."

The Deputy Prime Minister, Michael Heseltine, yesterday backed the calls for the further restructuring and consolidation of the European defence industry to match developments in the US.

He told delegates at the Farnborough Air Show: "Europe faces the same dilemma and we haven't moved with sufficient speed."

The restructuring of Europe's aerospace industry is already under way. The four partners in the civil aircraft manufacturer Airbus Industrie - BaE, Aerospatiale of France, Germany's Daimler-Benz and Casa of Spain - have agreed to transform the consortium into a single corporate entity by 1999. Separately, BaE and the Franco-Italian group ATR have merged their regional aircraft businesses through a joint venture called AIR.

BaE is also seeking joint ventures for its own military divisions. Its missiles business was merged last month with Matra of France and the combined group intends taking a stake in the French defence electronics business, Thomson, when it is privatised later this year.

BaE now envisages bringing other partners into the process so that in time Europe has just mediate anti-trust complications by robbing governments of competition for defence contracts other than from US manufacturers.

Unlike its US counterpart, the European Aerospace Industry is structured to accommodate national defence procurement programmes of different countries.

BaE is also under no illusions that issues of national pride, jobs and technological leadership will also need to be addressed.

There are already concerns that the restructuring of Airbus will involve job losses of up to 20 per cent along the 30,000 workers directly involved in the consortium.

There is also likely to be as huge battle over the assets that each of the four partners puts into the new company and how they will be valued. Privately, senior BaE executives believe that the timetable set for signing a binding memorandum of understanding by the end of this year will be difficult to meet.

On the domestic front, BaE appears to have ruled out an acquisition of a fighting vehicles business such as Vickers, maker of the Challenger tank, or GKN, which owns the helicopter manufacturer Westland and also makes the Warrior armoured vehicle.

But the prospects of a merger with GEC Marconi which specialises in defence, electronics, radar and weaponry, is bound to be heightened by the arrival next week of George Simpson as GEC's new chief executive.

Mr Simpson, a former deputy chief executive of BaE, intends to carry out a fundamental re-evaluation of GEC strategy and could, insiders believe, be the man to forge an alliance with BaE. GEC and BaE held unsuccessful merger negotiations 18 months ago but could not agree terms. However, there is still strong support within the BaE boardroom for a deal. "My own view is that BaE and GEC should have happened years ago," said one BaE board member.

one manufacturer of civil aircraft, military aircraft, military engines and missiles.

Rival aerospace groups such as Aerospatiale and Dassault in France, Daimler in Germany, Alenia in Italy and Casa would pool resources to create a single dominant supplier.

Overseeing this would be a European holding company in which each of the big aerospace companies had equity stakes.

The plan is being actively supported by the British government. Representatives of the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry sit on the National Defence Industry's council, the body which is co-ordinating moves towards European consolidation.

Nevertheless the strategy faces some daunting obstacles. The creation of single European suppliers would raise im-

Boeing mauls Airbus super jumbo plan

CHRIS GODSMARK
Business Correspondent

Boeing yesterday savaged rival plans by the European Airbus Consortium to develop a "Super Jumbo", the next generation of large passenger airliner. At the opening day of the Farnborough Air Show, the aerospace industry, the US plane-maker giant claimed Airbus forecasts for the market for such a plane were unrealistic.

"This might be a good time to offer a 'reality check'," said Ron Woodard, president of Boeing's Commercial Airplane Group. He claimed his company's predictions of the likely demand for 500-seater jumbos was almost one-third of Airbus's.

Boeing has a team studying the project and claims it could be developed for $8bn (£5bn).

Boeing and Airbus have previously collaborated on the development of a super-jumbo, the so-called Very Large Commercial Transport, but the talks came to nothing.

Woodard said both sides had then agreed the cost would be between $12bn and $15bn. "We concluded that there simply wasn't a large enough market to justify that size of investment. We don't think much has changed since then," he said.

The Boeing plan is for a more modest stretched version of the existing jumbo jet, the 747, which dates in basic design from the late 1960s.

The new 747, 500 and 600 would seat from 460 to 550 passengers, requiring a longer fuselage, new wings and engines. Boeing estimates this programme alone will cost $5bn to develop with a price tag of $230m per plane when the first one is delivered in 2001. The two sides differ radically over the anticipated demand from airlines for super-jumbos with more than 500 seats.

Airbus believes that lack of runway space and environmental considerations will encourage carriers to cram more passengers on to larger aircraft. Over the next 20 years that should translate into 1,400 orders for the A3XX.

Boeing argues there will be enough room for more frequent flights and, coupled with the trend towards non-stop long-haul travel, the demand for super-jumbos will be less than 500, insufficient to justify the development budget.

Privately, European aerospace companies accuse the US of using the failed collaborative talks to delay Airbus gaining a foothold in a market which Boeing has, until now, monopolised.

Yesterday Airbus was scathing about the latest Boeing attack. "The smaller number they are using is a self-serving proposition to support their claim that there's only room for one aeroplane," said David Venz, an Airbus spokesman.

He insisted the A3XX would be 20 per cent cheaper to operate per passenger than a conventional 747. Due to enter service in 2003, the A3XX will have to be one-third funded by European governments in what Airbus describes as "refundable loans".

The consortium, which is planning to convert its structure into a conventional company, also needs to attract partners, probably from the Far East, to share the risk and provide 40 per cent of the capital. But Boeing has troubles of its own with the 747-500-600. Hopes that the plane would be formally launched at Farnborough were dashed because the company had failed to persuade an airline to make a firm order. It hopes to achieve this by the end of the year.

However, Boeing did use the airshow to announce $6.5bn of new orders, of which around $1bn are thought to have come from British Airways.

BA is buying four 747-400s, three 777-200s and three 757-200s. In addition, it yesterday brought forward the delivery dates for 10 more 747-400s which cost $155m each.

Boeing said it planned to almost double production from 18 to 36 planes a month by 1998. It recently announced it was taking on a further 5,000 workers to cope with demand for the 777.

Morgan Grenfell fund manager suspended

Banking Correspondent

Deutsche Morgan Grenfell has suspended a high flying fund manager, Peter Young, after stopping dealings in three of its funds valued at £1.4bn.

Mr Young ran two of the funds, which have all been suspended after the discovery of "possible irregularities on certain unquoted securities," according to Morgan Grenfell Asset Management, the fund management arm of Deutsche.

The suspension was "pending an investigation of the value of certain investments held by these funds," added the bank.

Sources said problems appeared to be related to the funds' holdings in the high technology sector, the doyen of 1995, which fell out of favour this year. Two of the three funds are unit trusts.

Imro, the investment management regulator, said it was conducting an investigation into the three funds, just days after forcing Jardine Fleming to repay £12m to clients after a fund management scandal in Hong Kong.

A spokesman for Deutsche Morgan Grenfell declined to be more specific but the market swirled with rumours that a hole of up to £150m may have appeared in the funds which in total contained £1.4bn of investments.

"The fund managers will meet their liabilities in respect of any irregularities identified in the course of the investigations into these three funds," Morgan Grenfell Asset Management said in a statement.

The decision to suspend the dealings was reached in conjunction with the funds' trustees - one of which is Royal Bank of Scotland - and in consultation with regulators.

Of the £1.4bn invested the regulators insist that no more than 10 per cent can be exposed to unquoted securities, a more speculative investment used to boost the value of a fund's performance.

Mr Young's two funds were the unit trust MG European Growth Trust and the Dublin based MG European Capital Growth Fund, which is similar to a unit trust. The other is MG Europa Fund.

The manager of Morgan Grenfell's Europa investment trust - Stewart Armer - is not believed to be facing suspension or be under investigation. Dealing in all of Morgan Grenfell's other funds is unaffected.

The Securities and Investments Board (SIB), which authorises unit trusts, said funds could request suspension of dealings in their units for 28 days. If Morgan Grenfell wanted to extend the suspension it would need the permission of the SIB.

News of the suspension of the high-profit funds could cast doubt on Morgan Grenfell's bid for the Kleinwort European Privatisation Fund (Kepit), a £500m fund which has been approached by 10 independent fund manager, with £70bn under management, it was seen as one of the leaders in the pack bidding for Kepit.

It wanted to broaden Kepit's mandate to a European fund. Fleming, also in the race for Kepit, may also have damaged its chances after Imro's fines last week.

Robert Fleming, the investment bank with a stake in Jardine Fleming Investment Management one of the fund management firms censured by Imro, confirmed yesterday it had brought back some £700m of funds managed by Jardine Fleming Investment Management in Hong Kong.

Jardine Fleming Investment Management is Robert Fleming's joint venture with Jardine Matheson, and analysts wondered whether Fleming was in the process of reconsidering its links with the fund management group. But, a spokesman for Robert Fleming denied the fact the funds had been brought back to London was connected to the Imro fines.

Manufacturers begin to benefit from rising consumer spending

DIANE COYLE
Economics Editor

Manufacturing industry is at last starting to enjoy the trickle-down benefits of the consumer recovery, according to new survey evidence.

Separate figures yesterday suggested consumer spending is still gathering steam, with the growth in cash in circulation returning last month to its fastest pace since January 1989. Halifax Building Society confirmed that house price inflation in August picked up to its highest since the housing bubble burst in 1989.

Some City experts concluded that the Chancellor, Kenneth Clarke, would have to resist the temptation to cut base rates. Others predicted he would slip in another reduction - perhaps after tomorrow's meeting with Eddie George, Governor of the Bank of England.

"A cut in rates before it is too late can not be ruled out, even though the economic case is very flimsy," said Paul Mortimer-Lee, chief economist at Paribas. The signal that recovery is under way in manufacturing was provided by the purchasing managers survey. Its activity index climbed to 51.9 in August, its highest in a year and comfortably above the 50 watershed between growth and recession.

The Treasury welcomed it as an indicator of "brighter prospects" in manufacturing. The increase could be echoed by an improvement in the official figures for manufacturing output, so far stubbornly weak. Mr Clarke and Mr George are likely to have a preview of the industrial output statistics.

Yesterday's survey suggested that consumer demand is filtering beyond the consumer goods industries to the intermediate industries. These saw a sharp fall in their stocks of unsold goods for the third month running.

Consumer industries have started re-building stock levels. "This is a clear signal that the excess stock levels which have haunted manufacturing this year are over," said Sean Shepley, an economist at CS First Boston.

Overall, output rose sharply last month while new orders remained at a high level. Employment changed little, hovering near the 50 mark. The prices index picked up but remained extremely low by past standards.

Peter Thomson, director general of the Chartered Institute of Purchasing and Supply, said: "Although growth is well below the levels we saw in 1994, it is heartening to see a gradual upturn in activity."

Separate figures yesterday brought further signs of faster consumer spending. Cash in circulation, the biggest component of the narrow money supply measure M0, expanded by 0.8 per cent in August, taking its annual growth up to 7.5 per cent from 7.1 per cent in July. The use of cash has not grown as rapidly since the late 1980s boom.

There was also confirmation that the housing market recovery is gathering pace. Halifax reported a 0.5 per cent rise in prices last month, the same as in July. Year-on-year house price inflation climbed to 5.7 per cent - similar to the 5.4 per cent reported by Nationwide building society last week.

Most economists now believe the economy is in no need of further stoking. "Manufacturing is going to get a lot stronger in the course of the next 12 months," predicted Robert Barrie at BZW.

A minority believe low inflation means lower interest rates would be warranted. "It is easy for the Chancellor to make a case for cutting rates again. Inflation is falling and the economy is still growing below trend," said Simon Briscoe, an economist at investment bank Nikko.

GEC amends terms of Simpson package

PATRICK TOOHER

GEC last night bowed to mounting pressure from institutional shareholders and amended the terms of a controversial £10m pay package awarded to its incoming chief executive George Simpson.

In a move designed to head off an embarrassing showdown at next Friday's annual meeting, GEC agreed to water down the conditions attached to Mr Simpson's long-term incentive plan. The climbdown came after Richard Regan, head of investment affairs at the Associ-

GEC's share price must now exceed by at least 10 per cent the growth in the FT-SE 100 index over a three-year period for Mr Simpson to receive a huge block of shares, instead of the six months as previously agreed. "GEC and Mr Simpson have always envisaged that challenging performance criteria would be attached to awards made to Mr Simpson under the GEC employee share plan," the company said.

COMMENT
The Eurofighter was conceived of at a time when German unification and the end of the cold war were still strictly for dreamers. Like most such projects, it has developed a momentum of its own and is still rolling merrily along in an age and set of circumstances for which it is wholly inappropriate.

The £15bn weapon that Europe no longer needs

At first sight, Michael Portillo's announcement of the go-ahead for the hugely ambitious Eurofighter programme is a big shot in the arm for British industry and technology. But as is usually the case with government announcements, it is not all it seems. For a start, this isn't really the go-ahead at all, since the project still requires the Germans, and to a lesser extent the Italians and the Spanish, to commit. If they don't, it is hard to see how the British can really go it alone. But let's assume that in all likelihood the others will follow our lead; the real puzzle of this enterprise is that seven years after the collapse of the Berlin Wall we are still ploughing ahead with it at all.

Consider first the cost - £15.4bn minimum. For this, Britain gets 230 state-of-the-art fighter aircraft (great toys, Batman) and creates about 15,000 jobs. That's £1m per job. Now let's be charitable about this and make the admittedly heroic assumption that these will be multiplied ten-fold in the field once the spin offs of the project into other industries are taken account of. That's still £100,000 per job, which even for high technology is going high.

This brings us to the third part of the Defence Secretary's justification - that it will keep Britain at the cutting edge of technology. There's something in this argument. The effect of high US defence spending is to turbo-charge American industry and technology; it is the great powerhouse of the US industrial success story. Though too much can be made of the point, it is also America's way of doing something distinctly un-American, providing industry with a Government subsidy. But the point about spending of this sort is that it doesn't necessarily have to be on defence. It could just as easily be on sending a man to the moon, or in trying to find a cure for cancer.

The Eurofighter was conceived of at a time when German unification and the end of the cold war were still strictly for dreamers. Like most such projects, it has developed a momentum of its own and is still rolling merrily along in an age and set of circumstances for which it is wholly inappropriate. There will always be a demand for weapons of mass destruction, but we now live in a time which in this respect is much more akin to the Renaissance than the period we have just lived through. This is a time of "weapons for hire". That nations should still be competing with each other to develop the biggest and the best in weaponry, is an idea that's had its time.

The defence industry, in Britain and elsewhere in the world, has yet to reflect this new reality. British Aerospace proposes that the whole of the European aerospace industry be merged into one. This is at least a stab at the problem but is it something that anyone would really want? The idea of a single industrial complex to satisfy all Europe's needs is probably as undesirable in aerospace as it would be in any other industry. The only competitors would be the aerospace companies of the US; given that the US on present form wouldn't dream of reciprocal treatment for the Europeans, the upshot would be that both blocs would retreat into protectionism and the old no-win, hugely expensive and largely pointless game of competing to develop the best in weaponry would begin all over again. But then that's how the defence industry wants it, is it not?

How to make £30m in just eight months

George Simpson of GEC is in the wrong business, if he really wants to make money. He should be in the City, and more specifically at Charterhouse Bank, where a handful of senior executives have made more than £30m in eight months out of Porterbrook, the train leasing company taken over by Stagecoach last month.

Porterbrook is already notorious for producing a profit of £30m for its directors and staff. The service Charterhouse provided to these winners of the privatisation lottery was to put together the management buyout that enabled them to make their fortunes. Four of Charterhouse's executives, led by the general Victor Blank, plainly decided the opportunity was too good to miss and helped themselves to a share of the action. This would not normally raise eyebrows in the venture capital industry, where it is common and accepted practice for executives to invest in the firms they are promoting, sharing the risk with their clients. But this one was different, not least in its exceptionally debt-gear nature. The company, sold by the Government for £534m early this year, had only £2.5m of core equity, which became worth almost £400m at the bid price.

Thus the Charterhouse executives were able to turn an initial investment of just £89,000 into £12.7m. On top, they make a cool £20m from their personal share of the profits made by the Charterhouse venture capital fund, which also invested in Porterbrook. It hardly needs saying that all of them faced negligible risk - for well-paid merchant bankers - of at worst £89,000 of their own money. The real downside, if the company had turned out to be a dud, was born by the providers of bank finance and preference shares. Just a question of the luck of being in the right place at the right time? For some reason it doesn't look quite that way.

Unilever tries a brand-new approach

Not so long ago, business schools were holding up Unilever's legion of different margarine brands as a prime example of good marketing. They even had a name for it - "space packing". By offering Flora for the health-conscious, I Can't Believe It's Not Butter for those with sensitive taste-buds, and so on, Unilever simultaneously managed to cater for virtually all consumer groups while at the same time shutting out competitors by occupying all the available supermarket shelf space. That was the theory, anyway.

This approach now seems to be going the way of so many other management theories, and the Anglo-Dutch consumer goods company is setting its faith by the latest fashions - economic value added, core businesses, focus and the aim of concentrating on being number one or two in each of the sectors operated in.

Streamlining a portfolio that now extends to about 1,000 brands around the world (arch-rival Procter & Gamble only has 300) has been on the agenda since Niall Fitzgerald was named as Sir Michael Perry's successor late last year, but the scale of the action now being proposed - cutting out businesses accounting for up to £7bn of annual sales, or a fifth of the total - is much greater than expected.

Given Unilever's recent record, a steady-as-she-goes policy was never going to work for Mr Fitzgerald. The Persil Power fiasco and trouble with the competition authorities over the distribution policies of Wall's ice-cream were clear signs that things need to change at this £30bn-a-year company. Mr Fitzgerald is proposing to move quite slowly on the brand rationalisation; there will be no big bang. All the same, change on this scale is plainly high-risk. Let's hope Mr Fitzgerald knows what he is doing.

Unilever planning £7bn campaign to catch arch-rivals

ROGER TRAPP

Anglo-Dutch consumer goods company Unilever is planning to sell or close down businesses accounting for up to £7bn in sales in an attempt to put it back into contention with arch-rival Procter & Gamble, the US company it lost out to in the "soap wars".

The moves being overseen by Niall Fitzgerald, who has this week taken over as chairman of the British arm of the company, will focus on streamlining a brands portfolio that is about 1,000-strong and includes such household names as Persil washing powder, Dove soap, Jif and Domestos household cleaners, Magnum and Popsicle ice-creams, Lipton and Brooke Bond PG Tips teas, Flora and Blue Band margarine, Batches soups, Oxo and Birds Eye frozen foods. By contrast, P&G has about 300 brands.

Mr Fitzgerald, who has been briefing managers on his plans in the months leading up to taking on his new role, is expected to publicly announce the biggest shake-up at the company for 30 years at a fund managers' conference in Boston, Massachusetts next week. However, analysts predict that there will be few specific details then. Instead, the programme, aimed at boosting profitability by abandoning brands that account for about a fifth of the company's annual sales, will become clear over the coming months and years. Mr Fitzgerald has set 1997-98 as the time by which the company has "at least put the plan in place".

His aim is to concentrate resources on products that are capable of being either number one or two in their markets and so improve returns in the mature markets and free funds for investment in developing countries.

"We will be disappointed if, early in the next century, these markets are not about half our business, because the growth rates are so enormous," Mr Fitzgerald said at the weekend.

Weaker brands set to be dropped span all the company's operations - from food, through cosmetics to detergents. But foods are felt to be under particular pressure, with the John West canned-fish business thought to be a candidate because the company has already considered selling it.

"The key criterion is whether we have brand leadership or a realistic possibility of it. If not, we will look carefully at whether we continue with that product," he added.

The streamlining plan follows a management restructuring initiated by Mr Fitzgerald following his appointment as the next chairman despite being in charge of the detergents business at the time of the Persil Power fiasco.

Both moves are part of an overall programme designed to repair the damage caused by that episode.

Though observers say it will take the company two to three years to achieve the plans, a spokesman pointed out that the process aimed at "sharpening up Unilever's focus" was already under way.

It had recently disposed of the loss-making Mattessons Wall's meat-products business and acquired the profitable Colman's of Norwich mustard company and become the second-largest producer of industrial cleaning products by acquiring Diversy from the Molson Companies of Canada, while in the cosmetics field it had acquired shampoo producer Helene Curtis and sold lipsticks supplier Rimmel.

The company last month reported first-half profits of £1.12bn on sales of £16.5bn.

The soap war losers fight back: Niall Fitzgerald is overseeing the streamlining of a 1,000-strong brands portfolio compared with Procter & Gamble's 300

SFA to tackle accountability at senior levels

JILL TREANOR and PETER RODGERS

New rules to be published today by the Securities and Futures Authority will make it easier to discipline senior executives of City firms such as Barings that get into serious trouble.

The proposals were drawn up following widespread criticism earlier this year, when Peter Baring, former chairman of Barings, and Andrew Tuckey, his deputy, escaped prosecution by the SFA for rule breaches.

A key element of the SFA proposals is that if there is a catastrophic failure the burden of proof will be shifted, so that top executives will have to demonstrate that they have properly used all their powers.

At present, the burden is the other way round, because the SFA must prove the executives have failed to do their duty, which is a much harder task. Any shift in the burden of proof is likely to be highly controversial among SFA members.

The SFA's present rule-book says senior executives have ultimate responsibility for compliance with the rules. But the statement is so general it has proved impossible in cases such as Barings to pin down any specific offence on which charges can be brought.

which are being circulated for consultation, top executives could be prosecuted by the securities regulator for falling down on a number of more specific management responsibilities, such as ensuring proper control systems are in place.

Nick Durlacher, chairman of the SFA, confirmed that the SFA proposed a change in the burden of proof in the case of catastrophic failures. He said "it will be up to senior executives to demonstrate that they have discharged all their powers".

The other main thrust of the document will be more detailed guidance on the responsibilities of senior managements.

The new rules are expected to spell out several objectives senior executives must aim for, including the standards by which they manage the business, the quality of internal controls and the adequacy of risk management. The SFA is also expected to change its rules to allow the regulator to say more in public about cases it investigates.

The SFA has refused to say whether the proposed new rules would have led to prosecutions of Mr Baring and Mr Tuckey.

In the summer, Mr Durlacher said inquiries "did not uncover evidence of wrongdoing by them that would have sustained a prosecution for rule breaches".

IN BRIEF

• The French economy shrank 0.2 per cent in the second quarter of the year, according to a leading indicator calculated by the Caisse des Depots et Consignations. The first quarter saw a 1.2 per cent increase in GDP but the economy has since weakened significantly. Official figures are due tomorrow. Most economists are forecasting a gradual return to growth as the year draws on.

• Smith & Nephew has acquired a US fracture splinting business, Parker Medical Associates, for £28m cash. Smith & Nephew said its existing US casting product line will be merged with Parker, creating a casting and splinting business with a US market share of 8-9 per cent. Parker, a manufacturer and distributor of multi-layer coated glass, is based in Charlotte, North Carolina, and made operating profits in 1995 of £2.2m on sales of £7.0m.

• Blenheim Group's shares fell 15 per cent to 337.5p yesterday in the wake of Friday's after-hours statement from the conference and exhibition organizer that it was no longer in talks about a potential takeover bid. Potential bidders for the group were understood to include Reed Elsevier, the British/Dutch publishing and information company, and United News & Media.

• John Lewis Partnership said sales for the four weeks to 24 August were up 13.6 per cent from a year earlier and up 23.9 per cent on two years ago. Sales in the group's department stores were up 8.6 per cent from a year ago, while sales in the group's food stores were up 8.6 per cent in the first four weeks of the second half of the year to January. The company said it expects sales for the second half of the year to January to be up 7.5 per cent from a year earlier, with the estimate unchanged from last week's.

• Societe Europeenne des Satellites said its mid-year survey found its Astra fleet of satellites beaming TV channels to 64.0 million households, up from 58.9 million a year earlier. Reception via direct-to-home and communal reception systems rose to 22.00 million households, from 21.43 million, while cable networks accounted for 41.97 million households. "Throughout Europe the Astra satellite system is the market leader and reaches 94 per cent of satellite and cable households," the company added. According to SES, the company's direct-to-home and surveys in 15 countries, just 7.9 per cent of direct-to-home and communal reception households receive channels only from Astra systems and 17.01 million households exclusively from Astra.

• The newly refurbished Trocadero centre in London has signed a £3m sponsorship deal with drinks firm Pepsi. Under the terms of the two-year contract, the Piccadilly Circus entertainment complex will be re-named "Pepsi Trocadero", and its space age decor will take on a distinctly blue feel, with Pepsi's new brand colour. It will also take on a new theme, which the firm says will be "the link between Pepsi and the youth market". The reinforcement "link between Pepsi and the youth market" deal coincides with the centre's re-opening after an 18-month, £50m re-fit, transforming it into a "21st century space mother-ship" according to Burford, its property group owners. Burford paid £94m for the centre in 1994, and floated it as a separate company on the Alternative Investment Market last October.

• Geest has appointed Ian Menzies-Gow as full-time executive chairman. He joins from Hanson where he was a associate director and, most recently, chairman of Hanson Amalgamated Industries.

Unison to sue over pension mis-selling

BARRIE CLEMENT Labour Editor

Britain's biggest union is to join the legal battle being waged against large life companies and financial advisers for allegedly mis-selling personal pension plans.

Unison, the public service union, is to join the GMB general union and teachers' unions in suing companies that include Prudential Assurance, Pearl Assurance, Allied Dunbar and Abbey Life for selling policies under which individuals claim to have lost thousands of pounds in benefits. The big companies could lose millions of pounds as a result of the court action.

Unions claim that many companies have been given legal advice that they should delay decisions as long as possible.

Unison has finally "lost patience" with the reviews, which are being undertaken by companies on the advice of pension industry leaders. Glyn Jenkins, national pensions officer of the union, said yesterday that many members may lose out completely because their cases were approaching legal deadlines.

The GMB is expecting the first of its cases to come to court in November after a High Court ruling that they should be "fast-tracked" through the system. Bill Day, pension expert at the GMB, said that documents were being exchanged between union members and the companies concerned, although he expressed frustration at the continuing delay. "If these cases are in the fast track I dread to think about the 'slow track' version," he said.

Mr Jenkins said Unison was "dissatisfied" with the progress being made by the pension industry. He said the union believed that self-regulation of the industry was clearly not working.

The sector had in place a review programme which relied on the companies investigating their own practices. The review was not only behind schedule but open to conflicts of interest.

"Many people were encouraged by this Government to make their own pension arrangements. Unfortunately, this has left many people vulnerable to high-pressure selling from life companies and instead of looking forward to a secure and happy retirement they are facing the prospect of scrimping and saving just to make ends meet."

A spokeswoman for the Personal Investment Authority said the review being undertaken still offered the best way of ensuring redress for investors who had been disadvantaged by mis-selling.

This redress would be without cost to the investor, she stressed. "We are determined to see that firms apply the process effectively, fairly and quickly."

Hays expands mail arm with £65m buy

Hays, the business services group, has expanded its UK business mail activities with the £65m acquisition of Inkhold, the holding company of ICS Corporation.

The deal comes less than a month after Hays abandoned its £1.14bn bid for Christian Salvesen, undermining the company's ambition to become Europe's biggest transport and distribution group.

Hays pulled out after its bid was rejected by the Salvesen board despite a significant improvement in the terms.

ICS provides a range of early morning delivery services through a national depot network handling some 800,000 items a night.

Hays said the services and customer base of ICS were complementary to those of Hays Document Exchange (Hays DX), serving the insurance, travel, optical health and Government sectors. ICS also offers facilities management services, similar to those provided by Hays Workflow.

Hays said the acquisition would be immediately earnings-enhancing, before integration costs and before the synergy benefits the company claimed from combining the services of ICS, Hays DX and Hays Express Services.

Ronnie Frost, chairman of Hays, said: "There will be substantial benefits from integrating ICS into our commercial core activities. The acquisition will broaden the range of services and customers and provide a strong platform to expand into Europe."

ICS emerged in a management buyout in January 1995. For the period to 31 Dec 1995, Inkhold, the management buy-out company, made an operating profit of £3m on turnover of £58.6m. The price paid by Hays includes the repayment of existing borrowings.

Hays' share price finished the day unchanged at 458p.

UN action against Iraq sends oil price surging

MAGNUS GRIMOND

Oil prices climbed to levels not seen for more than three months yesterday after Iraqi military incursions in northern Iraq against the Kurds prompted the United Nations to delay a partial lifting of the oil export ban.

Coming at a time of lower world-wide oil stocks and rising demand, the news sent Brent futures prices up to nearly $22 a barrel, over $1 higher on Friday's close, and triggered a surge in oil company shares.

The turmoil came after UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali temporarily delayed the introduction of resolution 986, agreed in May, which would have allowed the first sales of Iraqi crude since the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq in 1990.

Iraq would have been allowed to sell $2bn of oil over six months to pay for essential food and medicine. Although Iraqi forces have now withdrawn after capturing the town of Irbil in one of the Kurdish "safe havens" on Saturday, the prospect of US military intervention has added to worries that oil supplies may be interrupted by a renewal of hostilities in the region.

Dealers said the UN move to delay the oil for food deal would keep between 650,000 and 750,000 barrels off the world's oil markets.

By late afternoon yesterday, the news had sent Brent crude for October delivery up to $21.84 a barrel, compared with $20.78 at Friday's close. Yesterday's level is the highest since mid-May, when the October crude contract closed at $21.83. November Brent was quoted at $21.15, up from $20.32 on Friday.

Meanwhile, on the London stock market, BP shares rose 12p to 632.5p, while Shell put on 11.5p to 942.5p. Irene Himona, oil analyst with Societe Generale Strauss Turnbull, commented: "Iraq is the joker in the pack as far as the market is concerned. It's all helpful for oil prices, and with winter coming and low stocks, the price strength will remain."

But Peter Hitchens of Williams de Broc described the rise in both oil and share prices as "a gut reaction" by European investors.

According to International Energy Agency figures, OECD oil stocks at about 2.4bn barrels are around 100 million barrels less than at the start of last year's third-quarter.

The shortfall is said to be due to non-OPEC production, principally from the North Sea, failing to meet expectations. One observer put stocks at 60 days' consumption, down from 63 days a year ago.

AEA neuters 'fat cats'

PATRICK TOOHER

AEA Technology, the science and contracting arm of the state-owned Atomic Energy Authority, has come up with a novel way of defusing the row about "fat cat" salaries - free bonus shares for all employees distributed on an equal basis.

Announcing details of a privatisation that should net the Treasury about £200m, AEA's chairman, Sir Anthony Clever, yesterday pledged executives would receive no special treatment in the form of share options.

Instead, about 5 per cent of profits each year will be used to buy shares for all 3,500 staff. "There are no special schemes for directors," Sir Anthony said. "Everything is available to everybody. There are no plans for share options and there are no long-term incentive plans."

However, he did not rule out introducing so-called L-Tips at a later stage. "Obviously we will look at that in the fullness of time," he added.

The sale of AEA Technology, which is a spin-off from the Atomic Energy Authority, is the last big privatisation in the lifetime of this Parliament.

The Government is selling 100 per cent of the company, but is keeping "golden shares" that would veto any takeover attempt for three years.

AEA Technology, which specialises in offering safety, engineering, consultancy and computer services to the nuclear industry in the UK and overseas, reported operating profit of £19.8m in the year to 31 March on sales of £253.3m.

Burmah Castrol motors ahead

Burmah Castrol has shown a sureness of touch of late that was not always apparent at the lubricants to printing inks group. It has taken years for Foseco, the metallurgical to building chemicals operation acquired for £299m in 1990, to pay its way. But, with the benefit of hindsight, last year's £100m disposal of the UK petrol business looks masterly in view of the price war raging on Britain's forecourts. Burmah reckons it would be losing around £2m a month if it was still in the business.

The group has continued tidying the portfolio in the first half of 1996. The disposal of fuel operations in Turkey, Chile and Sweden brought in another £89m in the six months to June and threw up a profit of £23.2m. That distorted the half-year figures, which showed pre-tax profits soaring from £117m to £149m. Stripping out the one-off gains, underlying profits were 7.5 per cent ahead at £126m, with earnings per share up 10 per cent to 32.8p. The re-shaping of the business means the group is in effect focused on lubricants and chemicals. More importantly, Burmah is more than ever a marketing operation.

The promotion of Castrol motor oils around the world has been well rehearsed. In the US from a standing start 15 years ago, Castrol has grown its share of a $5bn market from 1 to close to 16 per cent. But having become one of the five big brands, Castrol is finding it harder to make further significant inroads without conceding margin to a cut-throat market. So it has shifted its attack to higher-margin synthetic oils. Early results suggest it may be able to repeat its initial success with the Castrol brand in the US.

Despite falling steel production affecting Foseco's metallurgical sales, group operating profits from the Americas as a whole rose 14 per cent to £42.8m. Of more concern was Europe, where the operating result sank from £56.5m to £52.3m, including profit from Castrol. The problems lay in Germany, where not even the oil brand's marketing magic could prevent a 1.5 per cent volume fall. The malaise affecting consumer markets was mirrored in industry, with European steel production slumping 15 per cent in the first half and the UK construction industry in no mood to buy Burmah's up-market Fosroc cement additives.

But German rate cuts this year should eventually feed through to the European economy and, eventually, to demand for Burmah's products. Further out the promise of the group remains in developing markets. Castrol's eastern European volumes jumped 14 per cent, with Asia 10 per cent ahead and still on course to become the group's biggest region. Full-year profits of £276m before tax would put the shares, up 21.5p at £10.70, on a forward multiple of 15. Reasonable value.

THE INVESTMENT COLUMN

A proud show of Ideal Homes

Housebuilder Persimmon was proudly exhibiting its Ideal Homes acquisition yesterday. The £177m deal, part-funded by a rights issue, propelled Persimmon to the number four position in UK housebuilding, giving it greater geographic spread at a time when the property market is showing renewed signs of activity. It also held out the prospect of significant cost-savings and promised to be earnings-enhancing from day one.

Yesterday's better-than-expected interim figures suggest a good start has been made. Duncan Davidson, the chairman, says Ideal Homes has been successfully integrated, with all its sites rebranded and Ideal's head office and six subsidiaries closed, resulting in a one-off exceptional charge of £3m. Stripping out these costs, Persimmon's pre-tax profits advanced from £9.7m to £14.2m in the six months to June while earnings per share on the same basis rose by a quarter to 6.6p.

Ideal was included for four months, chipping in sales of £74.2m to total turnover of £202.5m. But the main driver behind Persimmon's encouraging first-half performance appears to have been its existing businesses.

Operating in the middle of the market, these businesses of up to 5 per cent for three- and four-bedroom houses in parts of the South-east, though prices were less marked further north. Persimmon's landbank also increased to 25,000 plots with planning permission - 1,400 more than in March. Mr Davidson is looking for further land purchases, though the return of land price inflation may act as a constraint if it stretches the balance sheet further.

Net debt post-Ideal remains high at £108m, or 40 per cent of shareholders' funds, and may reach 50 per cent later this year, while the high pay-out ratio

-dividend cover is less than two times - acts as a large drain on cashflow. Brokers raised their forecasts on the figures, with NatWest looking for £29m, up from the £22.8m recorded in 1995. That implies a forward price-earnings ratio of 16 with the shares at 215p, up 1p. While the full benefits of Ideal should be seen next year, the financial risks should not be ignored. High enough.

Bunzl papers over the cracks

The difficult conditions experienced by Bunzl in the first half of this year clearly suit the talents of Anthony Habgood and David Williams, the dynamic duo credited with reviving the plastic cutlery to cigarette filters group. Pulp and plastic prices halved from the peaks of last year, hitting Bunzl's core distribution businesses.

So the group did well to raise interim pre-tax profits by 12 per cent to £55.8m in the six months to June. Hardest hit in the period were the disposables and fine papers operations, which together represent 77 per cent of group operating profits. In the US, where Bunzl owns the biggest distributor of throw-away plates and packaging to the food industry, prices slumped up to 6 per cent. It also had to cope with bad weather at the beginning of the year, which cost 2 per cent in volume terms.

European fine paper distribution was another area struggling against the tide of falling prices.

Cuts of between 25 and 30 per cent in Germany and Italy left the businesses there only barely profitable. But it is a measure of tightness of the ship run by Messrs Habgood and Williams, recently elevated to chairman and chief executive respectively, that disposables profits still rose 5.5 per cent to £33.5m in the period, while fine paper held its result at £9.8m.

The future is already looking brighter. Volumes were 3 per cent ahead in disposables in the first half and the second six months will see the first benefits of £100m of extra business won earlier in the year. Pulp and plastic prices are already off their 1996 lows, even if the outlook is a little cloudier. Meanwhile, filters continue to power ahead and £75m of acquisitions in the period have yet to show their mettle, chipping in just £1.5m to these figures.

JOHN WILLCOCK

Fancy doing a Michael Caine impersonation in the film Zulu? Cromwell Productions, the independent UK film makers who offered co-producers the chance to be extras in their film The Bruce, are at it again. This time, instead of dressing up as a rebellious Scot at the Battle of Bannockburn, anyone who wants to fork out £500 to help finance the new film can fly to South Africa and take part as an extra in The Zulu Wars. The latest project is Brian Blessed's directorial debut, and will attempt to present an accurate account of the wars between the British and the Zulus in 1879. Get packing.

London. James Butler joins the insurance market as director of legal services from Mercury Communications, where he did a similar job.

Mr Butler replaces Jo Rickard, who was temporarily seconded from Lloyd's solicitors Freshfields at the end of 1995 until a permanent replacement could be found for the previous incumbent, who had resigned.

Ms Rickard returns to Freshfields after shepherding Lloyd's through its rescue programme and the proposed launch of Equitas.

Mr Butler, 49, will not have a quiet time, however. Some of those pesky US names still want to sue the Lime Street market, while others are refusing to pay up for Equitas.

Mr Butler should have a good feel for the City's machinations. In a rich and varied career he once did corporate finance at Baring Brothers.

You and I may both think that the Government's Private Finance Initiative is a dead duck, but that doesn't stop Alistair Ross Goobey and his cohorts on its Panel Executive from trying.

The independent body, Treasury-financed, is designed to "drive forward more value for money deals right across the public sector". The Panel has just appointed a new chief executive, David Steeds, since former boss Douglas Hogg went to CIBC Wood Gundy to set up their own PFI fund.

Since 1990, Mr Steeds has been corporate development director at Serco Group, a business and government services company with 14,000 employees world-wide. He helped put together Serco's own PFI bid for the National Physical Laboratory.

I can't help thinking, if Labour get in, Mr Steeds will head back to Serco pronto.

Banking Correspondent

Singer & Friedlander yesterday vowed to remain one of the UK's last remaining independent merchant banks as it reported a 41 per cent surge in half-year profits to £2.1m before exceptional items.

The profits growth was fuelled by investment management and the contribution from its new stockbroking activities.

John Hodson, chief executive, said the bank, cited as a bid target in the stock market last week, was not in merger talks with any financial institutions. "We're developing earnings per share growth which we are delivering to shareholders," he said.

Earnings per share, before exceptional items, rose 41 per cent at the half-year stage to 5.64p. Banking analysts, though, said the bank might yet attract a buyer. "I don't discount it," said Martin Cross, analyst at Swiss bank UBS. But Mr Cross added that he had altered his recommendation on the stock from buy to hold after its recent "good run".

The share price ended the day 0.5p higher at 128.5p, just below its 129.5p year's high. The merchant bank plans to pay an interim dividend of 1.85p, up 15.6 per cent.

More diversified than others in its sector, Mr Hodson described Singer & Friedlander as a "financial services company". Profits at its merchant banking arm were steady at £4.81m, compared with £4.83m in the same period last year, but its stockbroking operations - including Swedish stockbroker Carnegie and British broker Collins Stewart - saw profits rise from £7.36m to £12.86m.

Mr Hodson said profits at Collins Stewart, which rose to £4.22m from £1.61m, were driven by activity on the Alternative Investment Market on which it is a sponsor of newly listing companies.

The bank now has £4.7bn under management, up 56 per cent from June last year, helped by its appointment as investment adviser to Asset Backed Capital Limited, which has funds under management of more than £1bn.

Mr Hodson hinted that the bank might look for a buyer for its 30 per cent stake in mobile phone retailer Peoples Phone, which was forced to pull a planned stock market flotation last year and into which analysts estimate the bank has channelled £30m.

"As you look forward the [telecoms] industry is ripe for consolidation," he said.

He did not rule out selling loss-making insurance broker Edgar Hamilton, again pointing to consolidation in the sector.

IN BRIEF

• JIB Group, the insurance broker, said streamlining undertaken last year had resulted in record results for the first half of 1996. Pre-tax profits jumped 28 per cent to £16.4m on revenue 9.6 per cent up at £102m. The interim dividend rises by a penny to 3.5p. The group said it had significantly boosted margins by reorganising the UK business and focusing on growth areas. There had been a high level of new business in developing markets and specialist areas and JIB added it was confident it would continue to perform well in the second half of 1996.

• Mackie International, the Belfast-based precision engineering group, said the trading climate for its textile machinery remains difficult. The group is looking to broaden its business base to reduce its dependency on traditional markets and is reviewing operations "to determine how the group's resources can be streamlined to compete in the current market environment". Pre-tax profits slid from £1.32m to £1.04m in the six months to June, with earnings per share down from 13.7p to 9.8p. The interim dividend is maintained at 3.7p.

• Mice, the designers and manufacturers of displays, said that next year is looking "most encouraging" based on current orders and enquiries. Markets remain both competitive and challenging, but it was benefiting from the upturn in the economy, the group said. Discussions with potential acquisitions continue. Pre-tax profits soared from £85,300 to £276,000 in the first six months of the year, on turnover which jumped 43 per cent to £8.36m. The half-way dividend is hoisted a quarter to 0.04p.

• Henlys, the car dealer and bus group, said it was encouraged by the strength of its manufacturing order books for the rest of the year and by opportunities in its coach and bus division. The group is attempting to boost exports of its coaches and buses to the Far East. In the past 12 months, Henlys has delivered around 100 buses to four different operators in Hong Kong and three of these customers have come back with orders for 10 to 15 more vehicles apiece. Henlys coaches are also undergoing trials in Malaysia and China. The strategy being pursued in the motor division may take longer to show a worthwhile improvement in results, the group said. Pre-tax profits motored from £11.5m to £17.1m in the latest six months, with the dividend being raised 1p to 5p.

• Scottish Radio Holdings has agreed to buy Northern Ireland's Community Radio Services, which broadcasts as Downtown Radio, for a maximum of £9.7m. Scottish Radio is offering 33.5 new shares and £1.19 in cash for every 100 Downtown shares, valuing the latter at around 240p apiece. There is a mix and match election. Scottish Radio said its offer represents a multiple of 16.7 times Downtown's profits after tax for the year to September 1995. It said the acquisition "creates scope for enhanced earnings per share".

• Partco said it remained "well equipped" to take advantage of the opportunities being thrown up by the UK automotive aftermarket following the purchase of Serck and International Radiator Services in June. The group reported a like-for-like sales increase of 6.6 per cent in the half-year to June and said its leading share of the market has continued to be enhanced. Pre-tax profits leapt 21 per cent to £4.37m on turnover 7 per cent up at £88m. The interim dividend is raised from 2.25p to 2.5p.

German reforms trigger a seismic shift in Europe

The weekend saw Chancellor Helmut Kohl of Germany and President Jacques Chirac of France asserting that EMU would go forward on schedule, and in some ways more important, that the countries would be able to qualify for EMU.

As far as France is concerned the statement has to be read simply as an act of faith: a political statement from a politician which may or may not be born out of subsequent events. It is very hard to see France cutting its budget deficit by enough to qualify for the 3 per cent of GDP Maastricht criterion, but it is always conceivable that the figures can be managed enough to squeak by for one year. It looks impossible, just as it looks inevitable that another winter of discontent looms, but in politics nothing is certain.

For Germany the question is qualitatively different, for sleight of hand will be warmly welcomed and, in some ways, the German fiscal position is even more serious than the French. State spending is lower as a percentage of GDP (50.6 per cent last year as opposed to 53.7 per cent for France) and the fiscal deficit seemingly under better control (3.6 per cent of GDP against 5 per cent), but the starting point is worse, for France still has some GDP debt total, whereas Germany has none. This year German debt looks like being 60.5 per cent of GDP, while forecasts for next year are worse.

But cutting across these efforts to meet Maastricht is the need for tax cuts. Britons may think of the quest for tax cuts as being principally an Anglo-American preoccupation, the invention of Thatcherism or Reaganomics. They might be surprised to know that the cry for tax cuts is now stronger on the Continent than it is here or in the US.

ECONOMIC VIEW

So currently much more interesting, for ordinary German citizens, than the efforts to meet Maastricht, are the tax reforms now being promised by the authorities.

Britons might be surprised to know the cry for tax cuts is now stronger on the Continent than it is here or in the US

Details of these will be produced in the next few days. France too, has a budget looming, but there is not yet much of a feel for what the French will do. We know from a speech last week by President Chirac that the French will try to cut taxation to put spending power back into the hands of ordinary citizens. But we have no idea of what that statement means or how it might be reconciled with Maastricht objectives.

Germany, on the other hand, has proposed reforms which in many ways parallel the tax reforms which took place in the UK in the 1980s: a rebalancing of the tax system from direct taxation to indirect and from high nominal rates of tax, softened by numerous loopholes, to lower overall rates but with fewer loopholes.

A number of ideas are being discussed. These include cuts in inheritance taxation and in local corporation tax, and the abolition of the wealth tax on 1 January next. The most striking proposal, though, is a plan for cutting the top rate of income tax, currently 53 per cent, to either 40 per cent or maybe 35 per cent. A government commission on this idea is due to report in November, the idea being to have the cuts in place by 1998 or 1999 at the earliest.

How to pay for all this? Well, aside from spending cuts already proposed (and likely to be passed later this month), it has been noted that at 15 per cent the German VAT rate is low by European standards. The latest paper on EMU preparations by France and Germany from Paine Webber, a US investment bank, notes that a rise in VAT is being kept in reserve to pay for cuts in income tax, but that it could be deployed earlier if necessary.

To anyone in the UK, all this sounds familiar. Why, one might ask, is this Anglo-American tax-cutting agenda now finding favour in Germany? The answer is jobs.

As the graph on the left shows, employment growth in Germany has been bad even by European standards, let alone North American. While the German economy now does seem to be recovering after two quarters of shrinkage, it is a jobless recovery. German exporters have managed to improve their efficiency to compensate (to some extent at least) for the higher German mark, but they have done so at the expense of jobs. Even in 1994, when the economy grew by about 3 per cent, employment in the former West Germany shrank. JP Morgan, the US bank which has just done a study of employment in Germany, points out that both France and Italy have outperformed Germany's employment record in recent years. One could envisage, on present trends, the German economy growing at 2.5 per cent, yet employment still falling and, naturally, unemployment rising. JP Morgan reckons that employment growth will continue to be negative right through next year.

To see one of the reasons why, look at the chart on the right. Social security contributions have risen inexorably as a percentage of gross pay. German social security payments are not uniquely high by European standards, but add in German pay packets and they make the cost of labour the highest in the system and a deteriorating demographic pattern will make it impossible to do anything about the largest segment of those social security costs, that of pensions. That pension bill at the bottom of the graph is far too low to service future needs.

So what will give? I don't think we will get a sudden, easy answer. Instead, think of us at the very early stage of a seismic shift in continental European thinking about its tax and welfare systems. Germany here is and while it was possible to push through a tax-rebalancing exercise in the UK, it will take longer in Germany. This will be a 20-year process, encompassing all the large political parties, not something which can be achieved in a couple of budgets by a radical finance minister.

Nevertheless, expect German tax plans to have some influence here, even if superficially it seems that Germany is simply following the UK model. For example, if Germany has, by the end of the year, announced plans to cut its top tax rate to 35 per cent, it would be politically easier for a new Labour government, committed to keeping the UK top rate in line with major European countries, to hold the UK rate at 40 per cent. There is an international market for ideas about the appropriate system and levels of taxation into which all politicians tap. UK ideas on tax used to look odd by European standards (though not by Japanese or East Asian). Now they are beginning to appear commonplace. But UK is not much of a direct influence on continental Europe. When Germany switches the balance of taxation from direct to indirect, expect the rest of Europe to follow suit.

The German social model has been the standard one. As it is reformed, the changes will be reflected elsewhere

Cutting the social security wedge to below 40 per cent is one of the targets the government announced earlier this year as part of a plan to halve unemployment by the end of the century, but that would still leave social security costs far higher than they were at the time of unification. Looking further ahead, the combination of Germany's pay-as-you-go pension enormously important, not just because of its economic dominance but because of its intellectual dominance. The German social model has been the standard one for much of the rest of continental Europe. As it is gradually reformed, the changes will be reflected in changes elsewhere in Europe. But this will not happen quickly. The political consensus does not yet really exist,

Investors turn sour on the prospects for Tate & Lyle

Shares of Tate & Lyle fell to their lowest since December as the stock market fretted about its next set of figures. The sugar group's year ends this month and poor results are widely expected. It was, however, a decision to call a series of investment meetings that started some pessimistic souls worrying about the extent of the downturn.

Talk that ABN Amro Hoare Govett had trimmed its forecast - to £275m - added to the discomfort and the shares fell 11.5p to 449.5p. Most estimates are in the £280m range; last year Tate produced £311m. The sour taste pervading the group stems largely from its US operations and the world shortage of maize from which it produces soft drink sweeteners. The cost of maize has soared and Tate has been forced into the spot market to replenish stocks. With soft drink makers reluctant to accept higher prices, Tate's margins are being squeezed. An explosion at a Nebraska sugar beet factory in July is expected to blow a £10m hole in the figures.

There are hopes this year's crop will be much better and the pressure will be reduced, perhaps removed altogether. Such expectations help explain forecasts of a sharp recovery next year with, for example, NatWest Securities looking for £331.5m.

The rest of the market was in more buoyant form, ignoring the lack of action in New York. Although trading was extremely thin the FT-SE 100 managed to rally 16.8 points to 3,884.4.

Hopes the Chancellor will push through another interest rate cut this week and the return of nagging suspicions a mega-takeover bid is due to break helped sentiment. Oils were the star performers. Prices flared on the Iraqi tension with a five-year crude oil futures market. The United Nations' decision to delay the food for oil Iraqi deal was an important influence.

The excitement flowed through to oil shares with British Petroleum up 12p to 632.5p and Shell 11.5p to 942.5p. Enterprise Oil rose 12p to 521.5p; even Lasso, the subject of buy and sell advice ended 1.5p firmer at 195.5p.

Cable & Wireless, on hopes of developments at its Hong Kong Telecom associate, improved 7.5p to 428.5p and Imperial Chemical Industries enjoyed Kleinwort Benson support, up 18p to 826.5p. Cadbury Schweppes, interim figures tomorrow, edged ahead 2.5p to 515.5p as Lehman Brothers made positive noises. It expects profits to come out at £218m, up 6 per cent, and is looking for a year's out-turn of £563m. Analyst Richard Newbould is shooting for a 12-month target of 600p.

Allied Domecq continued to reflect its planned departure from the beverage and with Goldman Sachs making positive noises the shares gained 7p to 466.5p. Bass was ruffled by a large line of stock, said to be 2.5 million, on offer, falling 10.5p to 821.5p.

Rolls-Royce, on Henderson Crosthwaite buy advice and the expectation more Farnborough orders will come through, flew 1.5p higher to 223.5p. Lloyds Abbey Life, the insurer, was a shade firmer at 599.5p on suggestions Lloyds TSB intended to pump its insurance interests into the group, lifting its stake to around 75 per cent.

Tom Cobleigh, the pubs chain, fell 9.5p to 189p with the impression strengthening the controlling venture capitalist had been unable to find a single buyer and was proposing to place its shares with institutions.

Blenheim, the exhibition group, crashed 61.5p to 335p as arbitrage selling was made more painful by marking down. A little more than 100,000 shares changed hands.

Home County Newspapers added 29p to 224p on suggestions a consortium including newspaper man Andrew Knight was likely to assume management control.

Some of the bio-babes continued to feel the benefit of Yamaichi support.

Stanford Rook gained 22.5p to 485p and Therapeutic Antibodies 13.5p to 497.5p. Cortec International firmed to 308.5p on encouraging trials of an oral vaccine.

Millwall, the football club, held at 3.25p as director Jose Berardo continued to sell, getting ride of a further 750,000 shares at 3.125p.

His interest has been nearly halved in recent months to 6.13 per cent.

Quality Software, the computer group which came to market at 380p three years ago, jumped 37.5p to 255p and Craig & Rose, the loss-making paint maker, highlighted the volatility of narrowly traded shares, jumping 72.5p to 222.5p.

On Friday they fell 72.5p.

TAKING STOCK

There are suggestions of corporate activity at Johnson Fry, the financial group once famed for its vast array of Business Expansion Scheme ventures.

The shares gained 10.5p to 159p, a 12-month high. Interim figures are due soon, possibly on Thursday, and there is a feeling they will be accompanied by news of an intriguing recruit.

One name mentioned is Lennie Licht, whose family has more than 3 per cent of Johnson, once LIT Holdings. He is a deputy chairman of Jupiter Tyndall, the fund management group owned by Commerzbank.

Memory Corporation, which repairs defective chips, fell to a low of 37.5p, off 6p. It has been hit by the dramatic slump in chip prices. A year ago the shares traded at 553.5p.

CRICKET: If the new Cricket Board is to have any real effect, it must be receptive to drastic changes, Derek Pringle argues

England need high impact, low frequency

With another summer almost at an end it is cricket time again. The only trouble is that, unlike A-levels, the same questions get asked of English cricket every year. For instance, are England the dunces of world cricket? If so, who is to blame, and why don't we learn from our mistakes? These are perennial inquiries and suggest that cricket's problems are probably institutionalised, being both deep-seated and structural in origin.

Cricket in this country is being run as a business selling a faulty range of products: the counties and England cricket teams. So far, the public appear happy to accept this, at least in the case of the national team, who they turn out in droves to watch in the vain hope that they might, one day, win a series against a decent side like Australia, Pakistan or the West Indies. Meanwhile, nearly every other nation either beats us or runs us close, particularly abroad, where our recent record has been lamentable.

This summer was, until Pakistan's bowlers got their tails up, fairly typical. Two comfortable Test series were separated by a single decisive win in the first Test against an under-prepared India. But although that early victory, on a raw pitch at Edgbaston, ought to have given the home team the momentum to win at least another Test match, England allowed an Indian team hit by defection and disarray to regroup at Lord's, where the home side were lucky to escape.

Only a toothless draw on the flattest of Trent Bridge pitches allowed England to take the series. Still, comprehensive or not, it kept intact - until two weeks ago - England's proud boast of an unbeaten home record that has stretched back almost three years under the Atherton-Iltingworth regime.

By then, as summer fields began to brown, a well-rested and well-prepared Pakistan side were here and warning bells over England's difficulties in taking the 20 wickets necessary to win Tests began to carry loud and clear.

The first Test at Lord's, played upon a very different pitch to the one they had met India on a month earlier, exposed them and Pakistan were able to declare their second innings just five wickets down.

To bolster their bowling against Pakistan, England had included the Sussex leg-spinner Ian Salisbury, whose efforts until tea on the fourth day had been fruitless. A day later his counterpart Mushtaq Ahmed had taken five second-innings wickets and England had lost the match.

It was a pattern followed two Tests later at the Oval, where the little leg-spinner's six wickets were once again central to England's disintegration on the final day.

Wasim, Waqar and Mushtaq to call upon, they have a far superior bowling attack. They also have batsmen who score runs quickly enough to allow them the extra time it takes to wear the ball (usually after about 35-40 overs) into a state where it can reverse swing.

However, two losses from three should have been avoided, and to lose nine and 10 wickets on the last day at Lord's and the Oval respectively did little to bolster England's repeated claims that they have become a more resilient side.

And yet if both defeats could be laid directly at the batsmen's feet, victory - almost exclusively the remit of the bowlers - was never once glimpsed, despite first bowl on a green-tinted Headingly pitch.

On good solid pitches, the majority of modern Test matches are won either by accurate fast bowlers or top-class leg-spinners. England have neither and rarely have had, which means that the rules of engagement - a reliable line and length at an honest pace - have rarely changed, and won't until incentives like less county cricket are introduced. Dominic Cork's lack of swing is probably more to do with loss of technique through fatigue than the use of Reader balls.

Of course that particular bone of contention has been around so long it has become fossilised, presumably along with those county chairmen who keep rejecting it in favour of an old outmoded infrastructure, set in place long before the mass appeal of daytime TV soaps kept audiences captive in their own homes.

However, if the soon to be formed England Cricket Board cannot bring it upon themselves to provide a higher impact, lower frequency cricket they should at least reconsider the Aclfield report's suggestion that the chairman of selectors be given the right to withdraw England players from county games.

We may not be able to produce an Allan Donald or a Waqar Younis at present to unleash upon opponents, but we at least owe it to the country to ensure that what we do have is fresh and spirited. This is something the current system, in which players serve two masters - county and country - fails to comprehend.

Still the end of the Iltingworth era is not entirely gloom-filled; a state of affairs with which the chairman may not entirely agree should today's sitting of the Cricket Council fail to uphold his appeal over the £2,000 fine levied for bringing the game into disrepute.

On the plus side, England have in David Lloyd an invigoratingly barmy coach, who is at least prepared to give modern techniques a try. They have also discovered some useful performers in Robert Croft, Nick Knight and Alan Mullally, as well as rediscovering others like Andy Caddick, Darren Gough, Nasser Hussain and John Crawley, the latter pair at last linking potential to performance.

The good news is that all are relatively young, and when placed alongside the more established core of Atherton, Stewart, Thorpe and Cork provide the basis of a competent and competitive side.

However, the question of whether it can achieve its potential under the system is not one that can be answered in the veldt of Zimbabwe or the vales of New Zealand this winter. Only if England are humiliated is anything likely to be done by the new ECB. Action, which if past performances of the TCCB are anything to go by, cannot be guaranteed.

D-day for Illingworth appeal

Ray Illingworth, one of English cricket's most high-profile figures, goes before the largely anonymous Cricket Council appeals panel at Lord's today in a final attempt to leave the game with his name unsullied.

The chairman of selectors is fighting to have overturned the £2,000 fine handed out by the Test and County Cricket Board's discipline committee in June.

Illingworth was found guilty of bringing the game into disrepute over newspaper articles taken from his controversial book One-Man Committee.

He was also charged with making public statements "that may be prejudicial" to the interests of cricket, notably in passages that detailed his falling out with Devon Malcolm in South Africa last winter, and in revealing accounts of selection meetings.

Illingworth initially had 28 days in which to appeal, and the 64-year-old former England captain was so outraged by his treatment by Lord's that he decided to prolong an issue which has scoured his final summer of active involvement in the game he loves.

A four-man panel will hear Illingworth's argument that the details disclosed by the book merely allowed him a right of reply to Malcolm's allegations, also made in a newspaper article. Malcolm escaped censure, even though he was in breach of his tour contract.

Judge Desmond Perrett, QC, will chair a panel which includes Frank Chamberlain, the former TCCB chairman, Frank Elliott, chairman of the National Cricket Association, and John Warr, the former Middlesex fast bowler who is now treasurer of the MCC.

Hooper's eruption blows Kent to summit

Kent 244 and 215-3
Nottinghamshire 214 and 252
Kent win by seven wickets

What a difference a year makes. Last September Kent were bottom of the heap; this morning they head the County Championship. There is only a point in it, but they are still top. Kent had their moments yesterday though, notably when they were struggling to winkle out the last Nottinghamshire pair, and later, before Carl Hooper exploded into action, they got bogged down on the way to the modest victory target of 213 off 67 overs.

That they eventually made it with a comfortable 13-plus overs to spare owed much to a stunning display of destructive batting from Hooper, who at his best is great. He had spent 18 overs pinging the occasional boundary as he worked his way to 41 before he detonated. In 25 deliveries of mayhem, Hooper clubbed a six and nine boundaries to transform the match.

Sadly, this may be one of the last glimpses Kent supporters have of this exhilarating batsman. Richard Stemp took four of them, to emerge with 5 for 38, his best figures of the season; but, unusually in these circumstances, it was a batsman, the left-hander Richard Kettleborough, who led Yorkshire in with much back-slapping and fustian congratulations from his colleagues.

Two days earlier it was Kettleborough's maiden century, an innings of 108 spread over five hours, 20 minutes on a deteriorating pitch, that had turned this splendid game round and even their illustrious history.

It is being reported that Durham will move for Hooper if they fail to entice the India test captain, Sachin Tendulkar, to take over leadership of their struggling side. If Hooper accepts the offer he is expected to sign a deal worth £150,000 over two years. There is one problem: Hooper has a year to run on his contract with Kent, although he is apparently allowed to renegotiate at the end of each year.

He will be missed. Hooper has amassed 1,183 runs at an average of 51 in helping to steer Kent back into the big time. But they do not rely solely on Hooper for runs. Trevor Ward, having spent an idle 20 minutes while Hooper was raining blows on Nottinghamshire, regained the strike when his partner was caught behind trying to run one down to third man, and he progressed to his sixth Championship fifty.

He was quite content, as he had been with Hooper, to let his new partner, Nigel Long, take up the cudgels, which he did to great effect. The left-hander got hold of one Andy Afford delivery and dispatched the slow left-armed for six. The Long hit over long-on resulted in a smashed window in the pavilion. The pair knocked off the remaining 30 runs in eight overs. Yet there had been a danger during the morning session that Kent's bowlers might have let Nottinghamshire off the hook. Martin McCague did have Chris Tolley caught by Steve Marsh off his second delivery of the day. But there was a lack of menace in the attack, which allowed Kevin Evans to make an attractive half-century and add a deal of respectability to the Nottinghamshire score, but did little for their position just above the foot of the table.

Marks there, perhaps, for the Yorkshire captain David Byas, who had seen Hussain chance his arm against the off spin of Michael Vaughan earlier. All Yorkshire needed now was a break from the weather, which had robbed them in last week's Roses match.

They were spared and everything went their way from the moment Stemp pitched his first ball accurately. It turned and bounced and Such, the night watchman, was caught at slip by Blakey's glove.

Hands, and great selectivity for a 23-year-old, he played so well that he did not give a chance while facing 288 balls. Essex found themselves needing 248 to win. Psychologically they must have been down having been so well placed. On this pitch it was always a remote prospect, but not out of the question if batsmen of the calibre of Graham Gooch and Nasser Hussain got a start. But Gooch received a beauty from Craig White and Hussain got himself out.

John Crawley struggled off the foot to score 112 not out, his third successive century, to lead Lancashire to only their second championship win of the season. Crawley displayed great concentration as Lancashire, set 290 to win at Hove, won by five wickets in mid-afternoon. Crawley, who has been struggling with the illness since scoring a century in the final Test against Pakistan, cracked a dozen fours and a six in his 171-ball innings.

The Northamptonshire coach John Embury praised the swing bowling of Mike Smith as Gloucestershire secured a 15-run victory at Bristol. The match began with Northants' last wicket pair of Jeremy Snape and Paul Taylor wanting another 25 runs to reach the winning target of 243. They got to the sixth over before Snape, on 33, went leg before as Smith successfully appealed for his seventh wicket of the match to give Gloucestershire their fourth championship win.

BILL COLWILL
reports from Vejle, Denmark

England and the Netherlands yesterday won semi-final places in the European Junior Championship, but in contrasting styles - the Dutch with a majestic 5-1 win against Belgium while England beat the Czech Republic 3-1 in a bitter, bruising encounter. Mark Pearn put England ahead from a penalty stroke after 10 minutes, after being chipped from behind by Richard Kotrc.

As the tackles grew stronger England won a string of penalty corners, but a charmed life for the Czechs prevented further scoring until the second half.

The Czechs, reduced to nine men in the first half, had Kotrc suspended for a tackle on England's captain Brett Garrard 13 minutes into the second half. England cashed in with two goals. David Matthews was on hand to follow up a Jon Evennett penalty corner strike and then three minutes later Pearn did likewise to collect his second. Kotrc returned to score the Czechs' consolation.

Kettleborough the hero in inspired win

MIKE CAREY

Yorkshire 290 and 329

Yorkshire win by 98 runs

The Happy Hour here yesterday lasted from 11 until noon. Wickets were going cheap, and they were always likely to on this pitch, and Yorkshire lead no problems in capturing the five hours, 20 minutes on a deteriorating pitch, that had turned this splendid game round and even their illustrious history.

Richard Stemp took four of them, to emerge with 5 for 38, his best figures of the season; but, unusually in these circumstances, it was a batsman, the left-hander Richard Kettleborough, who led Yorkshire in with much back-slapping and fustian congratulations from his colleagues.

Two days earlier it was Kettleborough's maiden century, an innings of 108 spread over five hours, 20 minutes on a deteriorating pitch, that had turned this splendid game round and even their illustrious history.

spared Yorkshire a defeat that would have been humiliating because of their inept performance with the ball.

With five wickets down, Yorkshire were only nine ahead. The ball was turning lavishly at varying heights. In only his seventh championship game and with his previous highest score no more than 55, Kettleborough had to cope with off-spinner Peter Such bowling into the bowlers' foot marks to a cluster of close fielders.

Betting with soft, relaxed hands, and great selectivity for a 23-year-old, he played so well that he did not give a chance while facing 288 balls. Essex found themselves needing 248 to win. Psychologically they must have been down having been so well placed. On this pitch it was always a remote prospect, but not out of the question if batsmen of the calibre of Graham Gooch and Nasser Hussain got a start. The match began with Northants' last wicket pair of Jeremy Snape and Paul Taylor wanting another 25 runs to reach the winning target of 243. They got to the sixth over before Snape, on 33, went leg before as Smith successfully appealed for his seventh wicket of the match to give Gloucestershire their fourth championship win.

John Crawley struggled off the foot to score 112 not out, his third successive century, to lead Lancashire to only their second championship win of the season. Crawley displayed great concentration as Lancashire, set 290 to win at Hove, won by five wickets in mid-afternoon. Crawley, who has been struggling with the illness since scoring a century in the final Test against Pakistan, cracked a dozen fours and a six in his 171-ball innings.

Tennis
DERRICK WHYTE

The prospects for Britain's top player Tim Henman have never looked brighter since his progression to the last 16 of the US Open.

His 6-2, 7-6, 6-4 victory over the No 12 seed Todd Martin not only takes him into the fourth round but is likely to take his ranking into the world's top 38 and might even make him the first Briton to qualify for the Grand Slam Cup.

Not since John Lloyd reached the US Open quarter-finals in 1984 to take his ranking into the mid-20s has Britain had a player ranked inside 38, and Henman will almost certainly overtake the highest mark achieved by his British rival Greg Rusedski, who reached 33 in January before suffering a loss of form.

Of greater interest to Henman's bank manager would be qualification for December's Grand Slam Cup. This is the controversial event, with £6m in prize-money, which started in 1990 amid acrimony between the International Tennis Federation and the then Association of Tennis Professionals.

It is played in Munich's Olympic arena and involves the 16 players performing best in the year's Grand Slam tournaments, though there are still question marks about how seriously the players take it.

With a second round in Australia, a quarter-final in Wimbledon and now a fourth round in New York, Henman could already have qualified, and he would guarantee his big pre-Christmas pay day if he beats Stefan Edberg today.

Henman is revelling not only in his good form but also New York City and Flushing Meadows. "It's just very special," he says of playing in what is currently the biggest tennis stadium in the world.

"It's different to Wimbledon obviously. There are moments when it is slightly off-putting if people call out between first and second serves, but that can happen anywhere."

"You just have to concentrate. I haven't had a problem with it in the two years that I've played. I'm enjoying myself."

And his third-round victim Martin admitted that Henman is quite a hit for a non-American. "I think that's the way it should be. For anyone who represents themselves and their country as well as Tim does, he deserves fans. I'd rather see him have fans than some of the other guys out here."

However, Henman will be the villain of the piece if he beats the 30-year-old Edberg, who is playing the final Grand Slam of his illustrious career and is enjoying "darling" status with the New York crowd.

On the prospect of the match with the winner of six Grand Slam titles, Henman said: "If there's one player who I've learned most from it would be him, in his style of play, the way he handles himself on the court, so he's definitely been an inspiration."

"I don't think I'll be worried about ending his Grand Slam career. Whenever you play some of the very top players it's very important you do just play the ball."

"The last thing you need to do is to look up the other end and think I'm playing one of the greats. I'll just be concentrating on my game."

Henman's performance overshadowed some surprises in the women's draw. A month after she won the gold medal in Atlanta, Lindsay Davenport was beaten in the fourth round 6-2, 3-6, 6-0 by her American compatriot Linda Wild. Also out is Spain's Arantxa Sanchez Vicario, the Wimbledon runner-up, defeated by Switzerland's Martina Hingis, who will be 16 later this month, 6-1, 3-6, 6-4.

Otherwise, things went as expected for the seeded women in action as the No 2, Monica Seles, and the No 4 Conchita Martinez cruised into the last eight.

Seles flirted briefly with trouble, trailing 3-5 in the first set, before winning the last nine games to beat the Frenchwoman Sandrine Testud 7-5 6-0. Martinez was never troubled by Swede Asa Carlsson in the Spaniard's 6-2, 6-1 win.

"I was not finding my timing," Seles said of her slow start. "Then I started moving better and making fewer mistakes."

Her left shoulder, which may require surgery after the Open, is still troubling her, especially on serves. Seles realises her opponents are aware of her difficulties.

Hartford turns back on City job

Football
ALAN NIXON

Asa Hartford surprised Manchester City last night by ruling himself out of the running for the manager's job at Maine Road. Hartford becomes caretaker manager tonight when City play Charlton in their first game since Alan Ball resigned, but emphasised he has no ambitions to become full-time chief.

The former Scottish international killed off talk he would be City's next boss despite hints by his chairman Francis Lee that good results could give him that chance. Hartford said: "I've got no real desire to go for the job. I'm not going to apply and I've not shown any interest. I won't get carried away either. I want to remain assistant manager. I've got a contract here for that post. I'm only taking temporary charge."

The Blackburn striker Kevin Gallacher picked up a bizarre injury on international duty during a half-time warm-up. Gallacher may miss the Leeds match tomorrow after damaging his thigh in the kick-around for Scotland in Austria.

Blackburn's manager Ray Harford has been watching the Swedish striker Martin Dahlin at the weekend. The unsettled Roma striker scored in a World Cup qualifier in Latvia. Rovers are keen on the £3 million rated 28-year-old.

The Leeds manager Howard Wilkinson has criticised the Premier League for arranging midweek matches after a weekend of crucial international games. Wilkinson, the chairman of the League Managers Association, believes that international fixtures were moved to the weekend "with a view to clubs having the players back for a full week before the next match. If you're going to have matches on a Wednesday there's no difference from the old system of midweek internationals followed by club games on a Saturday," he said.

Wilkinson also said that he has failed to sign the Spanish sweeper Miguel Nadal from Barcelona.

Manchester United are resigned to losing the services of their influential midfielder Roy Keane for the Champions League match with Juventus next week. The Republic of Ireland midfielder had surgery on his knee a fortnight ago, but has not recovered sufficiently to be included in Alex Ferguson's plans for United's opening game against the European Cup holders in Turin.

The Tottenham manager Gerry Francis yesterday called for England to play all their international matches on Saturdays after injuries to Teddy Sheringham and Ian Walker plunged Tottenham deeper into a major injury crisis.

Heat is on in Spain

With the Spanish league only one game old, the pressure of the summer spending spree is starting to show at several clubs, and Real Madrid and Valencia have already suffered high-profile clashes between chairmen and coaches.

The Valencia chairman, Paco Roig, has had to play down his differences with his manager, Luis Aragones, after a television station disclosed the two had engaged in a heated argument at the airport on the way to their game at Racing Santander.

Aragones allegedly accused his employer of buying new players only when he had received money from transferring players out of the club.

The criticism seemed unjustified when one of those signings, Brazil's World Cup star Romario, helped Valencia to a 2-0 lead, but then his side let in an own goal, had their goalkeeper Andoni Zubizarreta sent off and lost 3-2.

Real Madrid's game at Deportivo La Coruna was also played under the shadow of remarks made by their new coach, Fabio Capello. After spending more than £20m renovating the squad, Capello - previously with Milan - complained that he still needed midfielders.

The Italian was asked to explain his comments by the club's chairman, Lorenzo Sanz, who concluded Capello's Spanish had been misunderstood.

Bobby Robson's improvised Spanish is coming on well. Helped by bits of Portuguese from his time at Oporto, the new Barcelona coach was able to tell reporters that he had been annoyed with his players before Hristo Stoichkov set them on the way to a somewhat fortunate 4-2 victory at Oviedo.

Discarded Hill has Monza on his mind

Damon Hill drives both for the championship and his career in Sunday's Italian Grand Prix at Monza, after his association with Williams-Renault was ended by the appointment of Heinz-Harald Frentzen.

Despite widespread interest in Hill's services, following the announcement he had been dropped by Williams for next season, he is not intending to commit himself to a new team this week. While Williams are expected to confirm as his replacement the German, Frentzen, on Thursday, in a £12m (£8m) two-year deal, Hill is said to have thought only for the title this week.

His manager, Michael Breen, said: "We are taking stock and are not going to rush into anything. All that is really concerning Damon right now is the championship and he is focused on winning that."

"We have had contacts from other teams since Damon's announcement was made, but nothing will happen regarding his future before Monza."

Williams yesterday pledged to give Hill their full backing for the remaining races. "As far as the team are concerned Damon will be given 100 per cent support - as will Jacques [Villeneuve]," a spokeswoman said. "They will be given the same equipment and the same support as has been the case throughout the season. The team will make sure they both have an equal chance of winning the championship."

Once the title is decided, Hill's choice appears to embrace three teams: McLaren, Mercedes, Jordan-Peugeot and Stewart-Ford. McLaren will doubtless be Hill's preference and they have indicated an interest in him as a possible replacement for Mika Hakkinen.

However, their contracted driver for 1997 is David Coulthard and Mercedes and the team's new German-based sponsors are unlikely to favour an all-British line-up.

Jordan represent a more feasible option, but for Hill it would mean stepping down from the "Premier League" much as the Silverstone organisation project themselves as a coming team.

Jackie Stewart's new outfit are due to announce a huge sponsorship deal, but they cannot be expected to figure among Formula One's major players in the short-term, and Hill, 36 in a fortnight, is presumably reluctant to involve himself in long-term projects.

Whatever decision he makes, it seems he will have to lower his racing and financial sights, although the championship would, of course, strengthen his bargaining position.

Bernie Ecclestone, Formula One's impresario, suggests the title should have been Hill's guarantee of another year at Williams.

"If I was a team owner I would have it in a driver's contract that if he won the Championship he would stay for at least another year, on a set fee," he said.

Ecclestone believes Hill, 13 points ahead of his partner, Villeneuve, with three races remaining, will successfully complete his championship mission.

"Damon's obviously going to win it," Ecclestone said. "This will probably make him drive harder and better. It will spur him on. He might have thought he would have had another chance, anyway, if he blew it this time, but now he knows he hasn't."

Frentzen's two-year contract will cover Williams' last season with Renault and their first with new engine partners, perhaps a convenient commercial arrangement should BMW be among the candidates to fill the void. Mercedes might also consider a switch to the champion team if they feel McLaren cannot fulfil their expectations.

Apart from his German nationality, he has also natural pace to offer, even if it has not been particularly obvious during this season, driving the uncompetitive Sauber-Ford.

At $6m (£4m) a season, he comes cheaper than Hill, who is understood to be earning $7.5m this year and, despite claims that no demands for next year were made, is believed to have been seeking $15m from Williams.
